Al-Douri said his response will depend on what Powell and other council members have to say. From media reports, the ambassador said, "We don't think he will present something spectacular."

Powell's address will take place three days before top weapons inspectors Blix and ElBaradei return to Baghdad at the invitation of the government. Their next report to the Security Council on the progress of inspections and Iraq's cooperation is due Feb. 14, and likely will play a crucial role in the council's decision on the next steps in Iraq.

In Baghdad, Iraq's chief liaison with the inspectors, Maj. Gen. Hossam Mohamed Amin, said Sunday the government is "keen to resolve any pending issues," and indicated that Iraq may have compromise proposals on hand for the talks with the U.N. inspection chiefs.

Iraq, which steadfastly denies it has weapons of mass destruction, is under pressure to make concessions and show progress in the U.N. inspections process to forestall any U.S.-British diplomatic bid for support for military action.

The Daily Collegian COMMUNITY BULLETIN

UMASS – Professor Ray LaRaja will lecture on "Public Financing of Campaigns in Maine: Winners and Losers" at 12:00 p.m. in Thompson Hall, room 620. The talk is a part of the Center for Public Policy and Administration Colloquium Speaker Series and highlights the work of UMass faculty members in relation to public policy issues. Admission is free and open to the public. For more information, call 545-3940.

UMASS – Theodore D. Sargent of the UMass Biology Department will present a seminar called "Industrial Melanism in Moths: Where Do We Stand?" at 3:30 p.m. in the Alexander Conference Room in Fernald Hall. Refreshments will be served at 3:15 pm, in the second floor bug collection hallway. Admission is free.

MOUNT HOLYOKE COLLEGE – UMass research associate Lynn Comella will present the lecture "Regulating 'Obscenity': The Texas Dildo Laws" at 4:30 p.m. at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center at 83 College St. in South Hadley. Comella explored the relationship between sexual regulation and retail in Texas, a state where it is currently illegal to promote and sell sex toys and other "obscene devices." For more information call 538-2022. Admission is free.

SMITH COLLEGE – James R. Ralph, Jr., a professor of history at Middlebury College in Vermont, will present a lecture entitled "Revisiting the Narrative of the Modern Civil Rights Movement: The Pursuit of Racial Equality in Peoria, Illinois," at 4:50 p.m. in Seelye Room 101.

TUESDAY FEB. 4

SMITH COLLEGE– Michael Klare, Five College professor of peace and world security studies, will present the lecture "Oil and Water: The New Flashpoints of Conflict," as a part of the series "Environmental Conflict or Sustainable Peace?" The talk is at 7:30 p.m. in Seelye 106. Admission is free.

AMHERST COLLEGE – A community service fair will be held in the front room at the Keefe Campus Center from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. The fair will provide an opportunity for members of the Amherst College community to speak with representatives from local nonprofit organizations about their work and about opportunities for community service they may offer. The event is sponsored by the Community Outreach Program. Admission is free.

SMITH COLLEGE – An entrepreneurship lecture will be presented at 12:10 p.m. in the Neilson Browsing Room. The lecture series provides a comprehensive survey of the entrepreneurial process. Topics include moving from concept to business plan, funding and venture capital, and women and entrepreneurship. Lunch will be served for the first 70 attendees. Admission is free.

HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE – Hollie Marron and David Stark, service providers from two different community-based psychosocial rehabilitation programs, will present the lecture "Toward a Compassionate Understanding of Psychiatric Disability and Recovery," from 4 to 6 p.m. in the Design Lab at Lemelson Design Center. They will address myths and stereotypes about psychiatric disability and share complementary perspectives on the process of healing and recovery from mental illness. The event is sponsored by the Lemelson Assistive Technology Development Center and is free and open to the public.

MOUNT HOLYOKE COLLEGE – Author Stephan Talty will discuss how American has shaped through the mixing of black and white culture by people from W.E.B. DuBois to Eminem at 7 p.m. in the Odyssey Bookshop, Village Commons, 9 College St., in South Hadley. Talty is a 1986 graduate of Amherst College and author of "Mulatto America: At the Crossroads of Black and White Culture: A Social History." The event is co-sponsored by the African and African American Studies programs at Mount Holyoke. Admission is free. For more information call 534-7307.

HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE – Hampshire College will host an update on the current Iraq situation with a faculty panel discussion at 7 p.m. in the Franklin Patterson Main Lecture Hall. Michael Klare, Five College Professor in Peace and World Security Studies and Carol Bengeldorf, Professor of Politics at Hampshire College, will give an update on the impending war in Iraq. The event is sponsored by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies. For more information, contact Laura Reed at (413) 559-5367

AMHERST COLLEGE – A screening of the award-winning documentary film "DERRIDA" will be shown in the Stirn Auditorium at 7:30 p.m. The producer and co-director of the film, Amy Ziering Kofman, a 1984 graduate of Amherst College, will lead a discussion following the screening. The screening is sponsored by the English Department and the UMass Multicultural Film Festival. Admission is free.

THURSDAY FEB. 6

UMASS – Special academic symposia will be held from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. in the lower level of the Campus Center in honor and celebration of the inauguration of Chancellor John V. Lombardi. The day has been promised to be full of events showcasing "the broad range of cutting-edge teaching and research" being conducted at UMass-Amherst. For information visit www.umass.edu/inauguration.

HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE – Carol Leigh, aka Scarlot Harlot, will present the lecture "Occupational Hazards: Women Working in the Sex Industry Speak Out" at 4 p.m. in the ASH Auditorium of Adele Simmons Hall. Admission is free. For more information, contact Ryn Gluckman at (413) 559-5506.

AMHERST COLLEGE – Poet Daniel Hall will read as a part of the the Writer-in-Residence Reading Series at 5 p.m. in the Babbott Room of the Octagon. Hall is the visiting writer at Amherst College and author of two collections, "Hermit with Landscape" and "Strange Relation." Refreshments will be served. The event is sponsored by the English Department and the Center for Creative Writing. For more information, call 542-8200.

SMITH COLLEGE – A Sahaja Yoga class will be held from 7 to 8:30 p.m. in the Bodman Lounge, Helen Hills Chapel. The class practices meditation and learn techniques for accessing the divine feminine. Newcomers are welcome and admission is free.

HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE – A video entitled "LIVE! NUDE! GIRLS! UNITE!" will be shown at 7 p.m. in the East Lecture Hall of Franklin Patterson Hall. After the screening of the narrative documentary about strippers who organized and unionized the exotic dancers of the Lusty Lady in San Francisco, sex workers rights activist Carol Leigh will discuss the video. The screening is free and open to the public.

UMASS – The invite-only Chancellor Inauguration Dinner in honor of John V. Lombardi will be held at 7:45 p.m. in the Mullins Center. Doors open at 6 p.m. For more information visit www.umass.edu/inauguration.

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2003 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Looking to the skies in mourning and soaring onward

On Saturday, Feb. 1, 2003, Americans awoke to a new tragedy. It wasn't a sniper, a plane crash or the bomb of a terrorist but something we never expected to see again.

Upon its descent to Earth, the space shuttle Columbia fell apart over Eastern Texas, killing all seven of its crewmembers. The astronauts aboard Columbia were Rick Husband, Laurel Clark, William McCool, Michael Anderson, David Brown, Kalpana Chawla, and Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon. This is the first shuttle accident to happen upon descent. All other space shuttle missiles have been put on hold until NASA can find out what happened.

The event took place near the anniversaries of two other space program accidents: the launch pad fire in 1967 which killed three Apollo astronauts and the explosion of the Challenger in 1986, which killed seven astronauts. Many of us watched the Challenger launch live, and have the images seared into our memories, especially those of us who were not much older than the age of three.

And while we mourn the loss of seven heroes and struggle for answers, we cannot stay frozen in this moment. This country has a spirit of resistance and has overcome many tragedies over the past two decades.

Astronauts since the beginning of the space program have taken incredible risks to explore the universe. They all knew the risks involved and embraced them for the higher goal of being able to advance our knowledge of space through their research. In a sense, we would be dishonoring the dead by stopping this research, by deciding not to move forward. Audrey McCool, the mother of shuttle pilot William McCool, summed it up best when she said her son did not die in vain and that the space program must go on.

"They felt it would have benefits for humanity. It would be a travesty if they didn't continue, because it helps not just us but all of humanity," McCool said.

It is in this spirit that we must move on.

Columbia is actually a good example of this. The Columbia was the oldest orbiter in the fleet, and actually preceded the Challenger by going on its first mission in 1981. In 1999, Columbia took the Chandra X-ray space telescope into space. The telescope is the most powerful X-ray telescope in the world and has answered some of space's greatest mysteries since it has been in orbit. In 2001, the Columbia went on a mission to do repairs on the Hubble Space telescope, which has been sending back images that could tell us about the beginnings of the universe and its expansion. Despite the tragedy of the Challenger, the space program moved on, continuing its research and expanding our knowledge of space.

So when the final note of "Taps" has sounded over this land, may we keep the Columbia ever present in our memories. May we continue to look towards the skies into the greater universe that these astronauts died exploring, for the advancement of society. And may we move on and continue with their legacy.

Communicating to a size-conscious society

Robert Carey

I was on a road trip in the northern reaches of New England somewhere. Driving along a lonely stretch of interstate, I noticed a broken down car up ahead. It was one of those extravagant and yet shoddily built SUVs. The owner was out on his tiptoes blankly staring into the hood of car as we passed him. His car couldn't have been more than a few years old, and it looked quite striking set against the roadside backdrop a snowy hemlock forest. Yet now that it was immobile, it was nothing more than a pretty red metallic stone on the side of the road. If it had stayed there, and proved capable of weathering the ages, then perhaps it would have made a nice archaeological specimen one day. But other than that, as it stood, it was just a large waste of matter, heaped and motionless.

After passing that enormous sport utility vehicle, my friends and I began discussing why people find it necessary to buy such gaudy things. American culture, it seems, is a size-conscious one. Not unlike other cultures throughout history, we've connected the aggrandizement of personal items with greatness. The private American owner craves the amplification of houses, cars, and other luxury goods. Often these sloppily-enlarged commodities, on some level, reinforce the owner's self-esteem, and the contagious result is a society of intemperate gluttons.

In reaction to American greed and the unseen strife and pestilence it causes around the world, many activists have specifically targeted SUVs. Pointing a finger at overt usurpation of American policies involving the extraction of oil and other raw materials from foreign countries as being responsible for the 2001 terrorist attacks, the leftists have been busy speaking into the covered ears of the masses about curtailing the amount of resources they're consuming, and rightly so. However, they have not been very successful turning the minds and hearts of the mob, and I suggest that a change in their approach is needed.

Instead of trying to hold SUV drivers morally accountable for their indulgence, why not just mock them for their stupidity? Generally, the thought process involved into buying an SUV is so idiotic that pointing it out to them is vastly superior to any sermon or moral preaching. I will grant that some people genuinely need a large vehicle due to a utility intensive hobby or because of some other elaborate employment. But on a whole the excuses and reasoning that go into the purchasing of a behemoth vehicle are, at bottom, the ramblings of a fool.

> "Not unlike other cultures throughout history we've connected the aggrandizement of personal items with greatness"

Some owners burn 50 dollars worth of gas a week, in all seasons, because they say they're afraid of snowy roads. Others say they prefer going grocery shopping only once a month. And, sadly, even more are numbed to the point of pure ignorance through excessive commercial exposure, and actually believe that these cars are formidable off-road vehicles. And when SUV owners are confronted with accusations that they have played a larger role in supporting terrorism – larger than, say, a thing like drugs – their silly little minds become enraged. However, I wonder what kind of response the overindulgent public would have if popular opinion was that buying an unnecessarily large vehicle is just plain stupid and expensive. Although they do serve as emblems of wealth, the truly healthy person doesn't need to surround themselves with gauds status symbols that greedily consume the earth's non-renewable resources.

At this time I'm reminded of the plight of Easter Island, a little dot in the Pacific Ocean made famous by the enormous stone heads that were erected around the vacant wind-swept plain. The story goes, that as the Easter Islanders were caught up in the fury of making terrifically large religious emblems out of stone, their society and resources began to dwindle. In an incredibly short time, their complex society was reduced to a handful cave-dwelling, dirt-soaked cannibals. Archeologists have studied the island closely, and on one of the island's ancient roads that stretch down from the shore to the quarries in the center lay a huge stone. It's over 60 feet long and weighs an immeasurable number of tons. The stone was elaborately carved. However, after years of resource manipulation the Islanders had no way of transporting this behemoth, and thus it stayed unmoved at the bottom of the quarry.

"Ice age" won't last long

Katy Noone

The term "ice age" means more to New Englanders than the acclaimed Disney animated movie of the same name. In fact, these two simple words can easily describe this year's winter weather. My friend once explained to me that due to my fair complexion, blonde hair, and most flattering colors being blue and pink, I am what her fashion class dubbed "a summer." Like many other Massachusetts residents who must tolerate the cold, I long for daylight until 9 p.m., flip-flops or sand under my feet, and days at the beach. This year, with the excessive amounts of snow and ice that our region has received, I am having trouble remembering what warm air feels like against my skin.

This season, Massachusetts has experienced a much higher level of snow than in recent years. Perhaps the warm summer we had in 2002 with very little rain or cool weather was one culprit in the almost-daily snow we've had lately. With the exception of plowing and snow removal companies, many of us are sick of the cold and the various inconveniences that the snow and ice bring.

Inconveniences? Why, yes. Think back to Dec. 25, that special day many of us refer to as Christmas. Due to inclement weather, my family and I were unable to host our annual evening party, which meant I missed one of the only chances I have to see all of my relatives together each year. Although most of the Noone clan live close by in Worcester, the snow was coming down so strongly by 5:00 p.m. that no one wanted to venture out on the roads. I may sound like the Grinch to those of you who hoped and prayed for a white Christmas, but I would rather have been able to be out enjoying the holidays than sitting passively on the couch snowbound all night.

Another reason I dislike ice and snow is the driving conditions it causes. I'm going through my first life crisis after recently turning 20. I now notice increasing stamp prices – 37 cents! – and dread adverse driving conditions. It is very difficult to drive safely with snow banks piled high on most city streets and in parking lots. While I drive about 10 mph when the roads are in bad condition, many other people ignore the road hazards and cause accidents. Not only was my car hit over winter break in an ice driveway, my sister's Hyundai was side-swiped by an unidentified scofflaw who likely skidded out of control down our poorly sanded street. Careless drivers are present during all seasons, but it seems that icy conditions lure bad drivers onto winter roads. My father has often said, jokingly, that local police should maintain a list of poor winter drivers, go to their homes and take away their car keys, not returning them until all the snow melts.

> "I will admit that the trees look beautiful covered in ice and snow and that, sometimes, cold air can be refreshing"

As someone who enjoys the outdoors, flowing clothing, and swimming, I hate bundling up – especially on this windy campus – and then peeling off clothes as I enter hot campus buildings, sweating from my long walk to class in multiple layers but cold from the dropping temperatures.

Being cooped up all day from November to March does not agree with me, either. Many individuals fall victim to the seasonal disorder that results in weight gain and depression due to lack of activity, sunlight, and fresh air. I know it is easy to blame depression, car accidents, and inactivity on winter weather. Of course, there are ways to enjoy the winter and remain content and active. Skiing and snowboarding remain extremely popular in the Northeast and give individuals enjoyable outdoor activities, even for relatively inexperienced skiers like myself who fly down black diamonds in the "snowplow" position. I will admit that the trees look beautiful covered in ice and snow and that, sometimes, cold air can be refreshing. I am also glad I am not living in a place where Santa Claus wears Hawaiian shorts and sandals to deliver presents on Christmas Eve.

A popular saying regarding New England weather is, "If you don't like the weather, wait a minute." Although seemingly endless months of snow, ice, and cold air may seem longer than a minute, summer will come soon enough. Then those people who hate the heat and sunlight can complain about how they would trade shorts, sunscreen, and air conditioning for a jacket, skis, and a warm hearth any day.

Space program deserves more recognition

Lizzy Nielsen

Seventeen years ago last Tuesday, at the tender age of four, I wandered into my mother's bedroom where the best TV in the house was. The date was Jan 28, 1986. My mom had been telling me for days that they were going to launch a space shuttle into space, and it was going to be broadcasted live on the TV. With my 18-month-old sister and me squirming around on her lap, the three of us sat in front of the TV eagerly awaiting the launch. I recall thinking when it happened that it was one of the coolest things I'd seen in my four years on the planet. Seventy-three seconds later, tragedy struck, and the space shuttle "Challenger" disintegrated in the air above the Kennedy Space Center in Florida. I didn't exactly know what happened, but my young intuition was telling me it was bad. My mom began to cry, and she hugged me really tight. I cried too, because she was. This is my earliest memory, and the sentiments and feelings that I began to feel on that cold, clear January day were awakened this past Saturday when the crew of the space shuttle "Columbia" perished in the skies over Texas.

It's been awhile since any other tragic event has occurred within the space program. So many other catastrophic events have taken place since 1986 that have done much to make the citizens of the world jaded; from Pan Am flight 103, to the Gulf War, to the initial bombing of the World Trade Center, finally to Sept. 11, 2001. I turned on the TV on Saturday afternoon and flipped to CNN and there were the faces of the seven brave astronauts killed at around 9 a.m. on Saturday, 16 minutes away from their eagerly waiting families on the ground in Cape Canaveral, Fla. I felt shocked, and as I looked at the faces of the astronauts and their families, I started to cry. It was short-lived, however.

I've seen a mother drown her five children in a bathtub. I've seen an American-born man blow up a government building in Oklahoma City and kill over 150 people, including many small children. Finally, I've seen 3,000 American lives lost when some psychotic men used commercial jets as missiles and ran them into buildings that define what America is. Now, seven lives lost on a space shuttle mission seem "not as bad."

Back in the '80s, it was huge news when a crew of astronauts was going to be launched into space. The "Challenger" launch was broadcasted live on all the major TV networks, and it was front page news on all major newspapers across the country. Nowadays, shuttle launches are hidden behind suicide bombings in Israel, or presidential indiscretions with interns, or the latest VHS release of Osama Bin Laden and his anti-American banter. Not to say that these incidents aren't news, but why is the only media attention that the space program gets is when something unspeakably horrible takes place and seven innocent lives are lost?

In the case of the "Challenger," every school across the country was allowing their children to take a break from addition and phonics to watch the launch. Personally, I had no idea the "Columbia" was even on a mission. With the "Challenger," a teacher, Christa McAuliffe, was making her first flight into space. Perhaps that was the reason for all the media attention. I would argue no because aboard the "Columbia" was the first Israeli astronaut ever, Ilan Ramon.

The crew of the "Columbia" deserves just as much mourning and media attention as what happened to the "Challenger," but sadly, what one deserves is not often what they actually receive. Will the "Columbia" be remembered like the "Challenger?" Not likely. I had no clue about the anniversary of the "Challenger" explosion last week, and I highly doubt that anyone else did either. This is sad, as McAuliffe was from Massachusetts, and you would think that her story would receive some kind of attention on the anniversary of her death. The "Columbia," which didn't receive even a fourth of the launch attention as the "Challenger," will be forgotten in a pool of suspected terrorist attacks and American troops heading into Iraq within a month. Is this wrong and unfair? Of course.

The space program receives money out of American tax dollars every single year, and I think the citizens of this country are entitled to know what kind of progress the Space Program is making. The Space Program deserves media attention for when they accomplish something huge, rather than just when something horribly tragic happens. I conclude with a quote from "Apollo 13," which summarizes the intentions in the above few paragraphs.

"No one cares when they're going to land on the moon, they only care when they're supposed to land on the moon, and never get to."

Sex and body health education discussed

"Sex-iversity" is a question and answer column designed to provide answers and important information regarding sex, sexuality, sexual orientation, sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and reproductive rights. Voiced by Winnie Chen and Sara Brumfield, the co-founders of Voices for Planned Parenthood (VOX) branch at the University of Massachusetts and active volunteers for Planned Parenthood of Western Massachusetts, the column is intended to help educate the University community about reproductive health, rights, legislature, and responsibilities. Much of the statistical information provided in this column derives from research done through and obtained by Planned Parenthood and its national affiliates.

Sex-iversity

Sara Brumfield& Winnie Chen

SEX QUIZ #1
TRUE OR FALSE:
1. Both men and women are capable of ejaculation.
2. The emergency contraception pill (i.e. the "morning after pill") is able to abort a pregnancy within 72 hours.
3. Nearly half of all women will have an abortion by the time they're 45.
4. Only humans are capable of having STIs.
5. Condoms protect against all forms of STIs during sexual activities.
6. Oral sex is a safe way to engage intimate sexual activity without the risk of STIs.

MULTIPLE CHOICE
7. Five million women become pregnant every year in the United States. How many of those are unintended?
a. 10 percent b. 25 percent c. 50 percent
8. By the age of 24, how many sexually active people will have an STI?
a. 1 in 10 b. 1 in 3 c. 1 in 5
9. Over 91 percent of abortions take place during which trimester?
a. 1st b. 2nd c. 3rd

QUESTIONS
10. What is the most invisible bacterial STI in the U.S.?
11. What is the most common viral STI?
12. What percentage of STIs show no symptoms?
13. How many Americans have genital herpes?
14. How long before symptoms for HIV become visible?
15. Which STI is often passed between school children via casual contact?

Answers:
1.True. 2. False. The "morning after pill," or Emergency Contraception, does not abort a pregnancy that has already occurred. Emergency Contraception prevents implantation from ever occurring. 3.True. 4. False. All organisms that reproduce sexually are capable of producing and carrying STIs. This includes plants and animals. 5.False. Condoms do not protect against all forms of STIs, which most commonly include herpes, scabies, HPV and crabs. 6.False. It is still possible to contract STIs during oral sex. 7. Fifty percent. Half of all pregnancies in the Unites States are unplanned. 8. One in 3. One-third of the sexually active population will have an STI by the age of 24. 9. First trimester. The overwhelming majority of abortions are done within the first three months of pregnancy. Roughly 9 percent are done during the second trimester, and virtually none are conducted during the third trimester, unless there are serious health risks. 10. Chalmydia. Although it is the most invisible, it is the most widespread bacterial STI. Three million new cases are reported each year in the United States. 11. Human Papilloma Virus (HPV). Over 75 percent of sexually active adults are carrying one of the 60 different strains of HPV. HPV can lead to genital warts and cervical cancer. 12. Eighty to 85 percent. An overwhelming majority of STI cases show no symptoms at all. However, the longer an infection is left untreated the more serious the consequences. 13. 45,000,000. There are 45 million adults in the United States diagnosed with genital herpes. There are over a million new cases reported each year. 14. Twenty plus years. Some cases of HIV show no symptoms for over 20 years. Although no symptoms are visible, infected people are still capable of passing the virus to their partners. 15. Scabies. Scabies can be passed through casual contact, sharing of bed sheets, towels, etc.

Critics herald George Clooney's latest Hollywood adventure

Sam Rockwell, who stars as real-life game show personality Chuck Barris in the new biopic, "Confessions of a Dangerous Mind," is perhaps much like fellow young thespians Colin Farrell, Ewan McGregor or, I'd even argue, Edward Norton – actors with immense talent waiting to burst but who haven't yet landed in that one film that will make them household names, or more poetically, movie stars.

Indeed, while you may not know Rockwell's name yet, he has been quite clever in choosing his roles: a free-spirited gardener in 1997's indie film "Lawn Dogs" soon followed by psychotic death row prisoner Wild Bill in the 1999 blockbuster, "The Green Mile." Now he plays another complicated, yet charming, character in "Confessions of a Dangerous Mind," and the part fits him well. It also is George Clooney's directorial debut (for the big screen, that is) and he gets the job done nicely. Finally, rounding out the trio of talent, here is screenwriter Charlie Kaufman, whose "Adaptation" is also playing in theatres now and receiving similarly rave reviews.

But back to Rockwell. As Barris, he is playing a person just on the brink of my own life experiences, creator of "The Dating Game," "The Newlywed Game" and most notably, "The Gong Show." While watching biopics, such as this past winter's "Catch Me If You Can" (where Leonardo DiCaprio played the world's youngest conman, Frank Abagnale Jr.), I often long to have been alive during the times when these people were making names for themselves, so while I watch the reenactment, I can say "I remember when that happened. While I did see reprats of "The Gong Show" when I was younger and even though I have watched the reinventions of "The Dating Game," I was concerned prior to seeing "Confessions" that I would feel left out from the charm of reliving such frivolous moments.

Happily, unlike Spielberg's "Catch Me," Clooney has somehow managed to make his film accessible to those too young, like myself, to have been around during that time period. This is also, in part, due to the always-impressive work of screenwriter Charlie Kaufman, who, even though he was probably a viewer of Barris's work originally, writes the script as though it were fiction that we're all coming in from the same know-nothing point of view. Kaufman introduces us to Barris from an early age, gives us some of his background (including many of his attempted, but failed, sexual exploits), his slow rise through network television and his near downfall when he lost most of it.

This brings us to the main plot device of the film: Barris claims that, while creating game shows and serving as host, he was also a hit man for the C.I.A. But from what the audience first learns of him, he's nothing more than a kooky, childish and somewhat cavalier character who would bring fright to people all over if he indeed was C.I.A. – not because he is intimidating or aggressive, but because he is so against type. We expect Schwarzenegger, Stallone or even Spacey, but not a goofball like Barris. That's what the book (based on Barris' self-titled "unauthorized autobiography") and film speculate as true fact, giving audiences evidence both ways about whether this haughty gent actually lived his claims or simply and elaborately spoke of fiction from an unhealthy mind.

Regardless, whether Barris killed scores of people for the government or was merely in the same psychologically damaged pool as John Nash, we, the audience, like him. Rockwell makes him fun, loveable and someone we deeply want to believe. Kaufman's script really gets into Barris's head, as well as our own, which is not much of a surprise since this screenwriter created one of the most brilliant mind-bending head trips, "Being John Malkovich." George Clooney is almost as sharp a director as he is an actor, and he realizes this by playing a minor role in the film. Looking at Clooney's career to date, he made several duds when first breaking in to film, but recently has hit his stride as a movie star. (We will forgive "Solaris.") For Clooney and Rockwell, "Confessions of a Dangerous Mind" is a waystation for both of their careers: it may not be the movie that makes the former a big-name director or the latter a much deserved movie star, but it perhaps puts them on the right track to both destinies, and now I will be able to say I was there when it happened.

Valentine's Day I: Gifts - good, bad & the unwanted

Running with Scissors

Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

Just as there are really excellent gifts to get, there are some pretty poor ones as well. It's pretty easy to avoid giving a bad gift; it usually just takes a little extra thought and brainpower to keep your lady happy. However, if you need a little help in the "don't ever give your girlfriend this" department, here are the five worst possible gifts you could give on Valentine's Day.

1. Gym memberships

Although seemingly a good idea, gym memberships can easily be taken the wrong way. Nothing says "I love you" like implying, "Honey, I think you're fat." Now, if a woman or man asked for a gym membership at some point, it is a different story. However, don't ever surprise someone with a gym membership. It could mean the end of a relationship.

2. Anything from Victoria's Secret

Lingerie can be fun, but getting a body stocking for Valentine's Day can send the wrong message. Girls are pretty particular about this stuff, and the worst thing a guy can do is buy a girl some kind of garter belt set that is going to make her completely uncomfortable. If you're looking to buy clothing, try a sweater. Just avoid the edible underwear. Nobody wants that.

3. Tacky stuffed animals

Now, we love stuffed animals just as much as any other girl. Our beds are littered with them, but some of these specialty, Valentine's Day stuffed animals are just incredibly tacky and ugly. They also put forth a lack of effort, and the last thing that a girl needs is another potential fire hazard to litter her bed. If you're really into the stuffed animal idea, try a Build a Bear, which are both personalized and cute and show a bit more effort than a bright pink gorilla from Wal-Mart.

4. Bringing friends along on Valentine's Day dates

This sounds totally ridiculous, but it has actually happened to a person we know. It shouldn't even have to be mentioned, but we know of a poor soul who's boyfriend brought his friend along on their Valentine's Day date. Unacceptable. It doesn't really fall with gifts, but such action is just plain idiotic. If you're going to take someone on a Valentine's Day date, leave your friends at home.

5. Kitchen appliances

Nobody wants kitchen appliances on Valentine's Day. We know of an incident where a man got his girlfriend a dust buster for Valentine's Day. Please, don't do this. Unless your boyfriend or girlfriend has specifically said "I want a Dirt Devil for Valentine's Day," or "An electric toothbrush would be a really hot

Thrust back in the race but lacking the momentum

New Houston and Carey albums fall short of their glory days

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

After facing years of turbulence, Whitney Houston and Mariah Carey both released new studio albums at the end of last year. Each singer has enjoyed astonishing success and influenced an entire generation of female vocalists ("American Idol," anyone?) but how do the divas' (who once dueted for a song on the "The Prince of Egypt" soundtrack) new albums stack up?

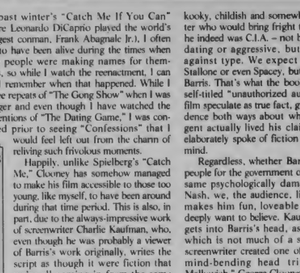
Whitney Houston 'Just Whitney' Arista

Houston has been looking frighteningly thin, plagued by recurring rumors of drug abuse and the legal problems of hubby Bobby Brown. Her highly rated interview on "Primetime" late last year only served to mar her image even more.

On "Just Whitney..." Houston talks like a survivor, lashes out at her critics and proclaims her undying love for Brown. She's unashamed of the life she leads ("Unashamed"), and she'll "live my life the way I feel" ("Try It On My Own"). She even gets a little help from the hubby on "My Love," where the two loudly exchange their I-O-V-E for each other.

Of course, amidst the declarations of independence, there are drippy love ballads such as the Missy Elliott produced "Things You Say," the remake of Debby Boone's 1977 classic "You Light Up My Life," and "Love That Man."

Despite having an army of well-polished producers by her side (or perhaps because of it), Houston's short 10-track album is a bland affair that takes few chances. "One of Those Days" and "Tell Me No" are reminiscent of some of her old hits, but none reach her soaring "I Will Always Love You" days. Neither does her once unassailable voice reach the peaks it did in its glory days (probably due to her drug abuse).



Mariah Carey 'Charmbracelet' Monarc Music

"Just Whitney..." probably won't rejuvenate her once sparkling career. It lacks the classic flavor of her golden years, and it probably has her record executives up in arms after signing her to a $100 million contract.

The lesser of the two discs is Carey's "Charmbracelet," an album that carries little charm. Carey suffered a very public emotional breakdown and faced the double commercial failure of her acting debut in "Glitter" and the soundtrack album's lackluster sales. She was finally paid $28 million to walk away from the deal. The recent and sudden death of her father added to the list of troubles she suffered in such a short span of time.

As always, Carey's voice is in fine form, still capable of delivering gutsy gospel to that supernatural whistle that is at the end of her range. "Charmbracelet" is the first album released on her own label MonarC Music (continuing to show her love for butterflies) and distributed by Island Records, her new label.

Luckily, much of "Charmbracelet" focuses on Carey's multi-octave vocal prowess rather than her hip-hop outings. Predictable production by hoohsots Jimmy Jam, Terry Lewis and Jermaine Dupri is overproduced. She belts out "Yours" and "I Only Wanted," but they're such banal offerings they're utterly unforgettable. There are few characteristics that help set

Amherst showcase

By Kate Billman-Golemme
Collegian Correspondent

The name of this fledgling quartet new to Amherst from Saratoga Springs, N.Y. derives from the word "umma," meaning group or faith, and "numinous," indicating the presence of a god. Like its name, the sound of Ummanuminous is also hard to fit between the lines. With its roots in jazz, the self-described "imaginary rock and roll" artists played a show originally advertised as funk while dipping into pop, hard rock and plenty of unlabeled territory. Whatever its title, Ummanuminous' January show at Amherst Brewing Company was irrefutably captivating and fun.

Ummanuminous Amherst Brewing Company Jan. 19

The band proved the multiple musical definitions to be true, sampling a wide spectrum of genres before the intimate weekend crowd. The two and a half-hour set included impressive originals, innovative cover twists and even some spoken word. One patron, attempting to grapple with the group asked a friend, "Do you think they sound more like Steely Dan or the Doobie Brothers?"

The band opened with a couple of self-penned tunes, proving their range and mastery early. Drummer Zak M. Trojano surprised more than a few when, from behind the kit, he led vocals on "Kitty Hums It," a hypnotic jazzy ballot about a bachelor party that confesses, "I traded in the truth for a laugh 'cause I'm going down." Not unlike Phil Collins, the academically trained percussionist wore

Action racing falls short of plot and character development

By LAUREN FREEMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The premise for "Biker Boyz" is based on an article from the Los Angeles New Times that featured a Californian sub-culture of a population of mid-class bikers who illegally race for money and respect. "Biker Boyz" had the potential to be quality. Films dealing with underground goings-on, such as these motorcycle races, have the built-in ability to remind viewers that as unlikely as it may seem, we can empathize with and sympathize for people of all walks of life. However, to ensure greatness, this idea of universal understanding has to be the primary driving force behind the narrative. This is not the case for "Biker Boyz."

'Biker Boyz'
Directed by Reggie Rock Bythewood
Starring by Laurence Fishburne Derek Luke Bell Calloway
Dreamworks Distribution LLC

The most important element of a screenplay (and thus a film) is conflict. It seems like when dealing with the subject of racing, it is difficult to distribute equal weight between the conflict of the races in and of themselves and any additional conflicts that make up the meat of the narrative. Any conflict from the various races in "Biker Boyz" was given secondary importance, becoming too melodramatic; it is obvious that something unintended is going on with the plot when during the supposed climactic, emotional scenes, the audience is laughing.

Basically, it is very difficult to make a good movie about racing; think of other not-so-good racing movies like "Prefontaine" and "The Fast and the Furious." What made "Rebel Without a Cause" so good was that the car races were secondary to the development of James Dean's character and his motives. There is always a person behind a passion, and it is far more interesting to explore that individual in relation to the passion, rather than evaluating the passion in relation to the person.

Sadly, the characters in this film were never fully developed. In particular, the female characters were given wimpy roles that didn't give the actresses behind the roles credit where credit is due. It is a sin to stick Lisa Bonet in the middle of a plot and virtually unexplore her character, save the occasional use of a comfort object for Lawrence Fishburne.

If you want to see a film with hot girls and guys, with stylish clothes and some pretty modern slang, this movie will hold your attention. If you are a motorcycle connoisseur and prefer flipping through the pages of Motor Trend to any other pastime, this movie will be a pleasing experience. But the point is this film doesn't transcend the exterior characteristics of the potentially intimate crowd of people that it attempts to deal with. "Biker Boyz" is a materialistic film that is trying too hard to disguise itself, yet it fools no one.

numb hats for the show. But Trojano is not the exception, all four of the young musicians demonstrated versatility on vocal melodies, instrumental harmonies and generous solos.

Keyboardist and physicist Jazer Giles illustrated this phenomenon with his own "Space Flight," and Billy Joel's "Movin' Out (Anthony's Song)" as, like Joel, he mixed the ivory tickling with smooth and earnest vocals. The latter tune evoked mans to join in as Giles sung of getting a "heart attack-ack-ack..." But it wasn't all fun and games, as midway through the song, the bar was canvassed by the Amherst Police Department. To the oblivion of the band, there were random ID checks.

Despite the freezing temperatures outside, things within the ABC began to warm up mid-way through the first set, especially after Jon Bon Jovi's "Living On A Prayer." Saxophonist Mike Flanagan augmented the song with a generous tribute to the musician's excellence before following with the spoken-word piece, "Living on a prayer health insurance." Wearing rainbow glasses, Flanagan attempted to tell the audience the plan, insurance based on – you guessed it – a prayer.

While enjoying themselves on-stage, the band was playful and communicative with the largely student-based crowd. Frequent groupie cries of "We love you Emma!" crossed paths with a plea to turn up the vocals and, of all things, a John Mayer request. Strikingly handsome, the four appeal to more senses than just auditory. One graduate student commented, "They certainly seem arrogant, but they are good looking."

Brazilian-trained guitarist Levin Schwartz, also of the local bluegrass group, Few and Far Between, shined especially brightly during the Beatles-governed second set. After the break and a lengthy solo by Trojano, Schwartz, a UMass alumnus, led the group into Paul McCartney's "You Never Give Me Your Money" immediately following was the dreamy Lennon number, "Sun King." After "She Came In Through The Bathroom Window," it was clear the audience was along for the full ride of Abbey Road's side two and loved it. The otherwise sedate handfuls that stayed on through the early morning became jovial and animated, yet many were left dumbfounded when Schwartz concluded the show with "Someday I'm gonna make her mine."

The burgeoning quartet entertained with an eclectic and organic sound, demonstrating that their category is quite imaginary and hard to frame. Their talent is entertaining and fresh in a time of jamband excess. A stronger cohesion and fluidity will make Ummanuminous exceptional. Keep an eye out for the quad in this and surrounding areas; they're sure to be playing at numinous venues.

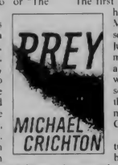
Michael Crichton's latest novel surfaces

'Prey' marks Crichton's same old story, told the same old way

By JAKE D. LEWIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It must be difficult to be Michael Crichton; he is one of the most well known (and highest paid) authors ever, releasing a new book every two or three years. For a popular novelist, that wait is an eternity, and it's also a double-edged sword, considering that fellow bestsellers like Stephen King, John Grisham, Dean Koontz and others put out a new book every year – sometimes more than one annually. If one of their books stinks, the reader can, at the very least, say that the next one to redeem it is probably not too far off.

'Prey'
By Michael Crichton
HarperCollins Publishers



In Crichton's case, however, his novels are like the president; you're stuck with what you have for the next several years. Crichton's latest thriller, "Prey," simply isn't the Crichton we were hoping for. In fact, it's the same exact Crichton we've been reading for years. There's not much difference between "Prey" and "Jurassic Park" or "Sphere" or "Congo" or "The Andromeda Strain." You get the idea.

Just like the aforementioned titles, "Prey" is about something inhuman that goes after a group of technology-savvy people. In this case, the threat is a swarm of microscopic cameras, created by a government agency to secretly infiltrate enemy territory in wartime and to deliver all sorts of intelligence back to the good guys. A bunch of these cameras escaped from a New Mexico lab and have since evolved, learning behaviors and strategies, including eating people, talking and listening. With these defenses in place, the swarm begins to multiply and soon takes revenge on its creators, one of whom is Jack Foreman, a stay-at-home dad who made a computer program that teaches machines how to be predators. Called in to save the day, Jack and friends soon become the hunter's prey.

In "Jurassic Park," the threat was a little more imaginable because the reader (or viewer) knows the fear a dinosaur can inspire. "Prey" most closely resembles "The Andromeda Strain," because it's about tiny, little things that can kill you; however, in that book, there was more reality as a virus, and not cameras, set out to destroy. With "Prey," the reader may feel tension when a swarm of hungry things are after the protagonist, but it has no base in reality. Dinosaurs, viruses or the underwater claustrophobia of "Sphere" may not be immediate dangers to readers, but they're much easier to fathom. And when there's more of an ability to understand what's going on in the book, then an author is most successful in the thriller genre.

That's not to say that it's against the law to use our imaginations. Indeed, Crichton's last novel, "Timeline," about journeying back to the 14th century, is just as fictional as killer cameras (at least, at present), but it was much more fun. Where's the amusement in "Prey?" The story mostly takes place at a laboratory in the middle of the desert; there are only a few places characters can go from there: inside or outside. And as neither choice offers much variety, the characters do go back and forth between the lab and the outdoors in an effort to outwit the wily cameras. It's only exciting (and plausible) the first time around.

The first third of the book, which follows Jack at home before he's whisked away to New Mexico, is the most gripping. He begins to sense there is something wrong with his wife, Julia (who works for the lab that created the machines), and he finds odd things going on at his house, especially with his newborn, who has developed a rash that doctors can't seem to explain. He also sees things – or thinks he does – that his scientifically trained mind can't explain. Sadly, neither can Crichton, or the reader, by book's end.

As is customary, Crichton includes pictures, definitions and so on throughout the book, as well as a bibliography from which he researched the material. He's done his work – that much can be said – but for an audience that wants more thrills than science class lectures, he leaves much unsaid. The author even offers an epilogue where Jack says how much this all doesn't add up. It should be known, however, that Crichton sold the movie rights to "Prey" even before it was printed, so he might have seen a sequel in mind sometime down the line – though again, readers might have to wait a presidential term to see it.

With "Prey," the reader, not the characters or even the author, unfortunately becomes the fallen victim.

Can Houston and Carey regain their glitter?

apart one song from another – they all just blur into one big mess of swirling beats, swaying guitar and keyboard instrumentation.

Carey is still privy to cuddling up to rap stars, a trend so tired it's like beating a dead horse by now. "Boy (I Need You)" featuring Cam'ron is so similar to the original you'll have difficulty differentiating between the two. On "You Got Me" featuring Jay-Z and Freeway, it takes more than a minute until we finally hear Carey coo some utterly indistinguishable lyrics.

There are few moments that stand out. Behind a mournful acoustic guitar, "Clown" lashes out at an acquaintance that claimed he was with Carey (Eminem?) and should have never done her wrong. "You should've never intimated/ We were lovers/ When you know very well/ We never even touched each other."

The piano driven "Sunflowers for Alfred Roy," a song devoted to her father, shines like a ray of light. Tender vocals such as "Strange is feel that proud, strong man/ Grip tightly to my hand/ Hard to see the life inside/ Wane as the days went by" show she's gone through more disappointment and sadness than her gleaming smile usually tells.

America loves stories of underdogs, and Carey's resurgence has played out decidedly well. Carey's unwavering fan base has even received some retribution for standing by the diva during her troubled time as her label has encouraged her to get up close and personal with her devoted following. She's always been one of the most reachable pop stars of our time, and that's one thing that truly sets her apart.

LECTURES

AMHERST – Today at 7 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center, Danny Glover and Sonia Sanchez will speak on the "Responsibility of the Black Artist in the 21st Century," as part of celebrating Black History Month.

Glover, a well-known and honored actor for films such as "The Color Purple," "Beloved," the "Lethal Weapon" series and most recently, "The Royal Tenenbaums," is a committed human rights activist and has traveled widely, promoting relief for African nations. He is board chair of the TransAfrica Forum, which deals with issues relating to Africa and the Caribbean and has also been Goodwill Ambassador for the United Nations Development Program since 1998.

Sonia Sanchez is a renowned writer, poet, playwright and activist who has been an influential force in African American literary and political culture for over three decades. Sanchez has lectured at over 500 universities and colleges in the United States and has traveled extensively, reading her poetry throughout the world.

Time event is free open to the public. For more information contact Hind Mari at 577-5791 or Sonny Suchdev at (413) 545-2149.

SOUTH HADLEY – In celebration of February's Black History Month and March's Women's History Month, U.S. Congresswoman Eleanor Holmes Norton and award-winning journalist Joan Steinau Lester will discuss book at the Gamble Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College on Thursday, Feb. 27 at 7:30 p.m.

The book, "Fire in My Soul: Eleanor Holmes Norton in Conversation with Joan Steinau Lester," tells of Norton's passionate life in civil right's activism and U.S. legislature. Thought of as one of the most powerful women in American history, Norton is referred to as the "Warrior on the Hill" for the spirit with which she has waged political battles spanning more than four decades.

The author, Joan Steinau Lester, a woman who spent many years with Norton, tells the story of Norton's rise to leadership with poignancy and respect. This fascinating biography reveals the dimensions of a woman who remains a key element in the legacy of the Civil Rights Movement. Conversations with Norton, as well as interviews with colleagues, family and friends, paint a fascinating portrait of the role one woman can play in changing the race and gender lines of a nation.

Lester is an award-winning commentator and columnist, as well as author of "The Future of White Men and Other Diversity Dilemmas" and "Taking Charge: Every Woman's Action Guide." She has appeared in publications such as Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, USA Today and the San Francisco Chronicle and has also been featured regularly on National Public Radio and Public Radio International.

AMHERST – On Friday, Feb. 14, Emily Romney, Chair of the Voice Department at the Longy School of Music in Cambridge, Mass., will be conduct a free lecture and class at the University of Massachusetts.

At the Longy School of Music, Romney approaches the voice as a living instrument, focusing on biological and anatomical studies as well as theoretical ones. In this class, Romney will present an overview of vocal pedagogy in the 21st century, and students will learn about voice, interact with professionals and try their hand at teaching.

The event is open to auditors from off-campus and will take place in Room 44 in the Music Wing of the Fine Arts Center from 1:30 to 3:30 p.m.

Those interested in more information, call M. Kushnick at (413) 546-0018.

APPLICATIONS

AMHERST – Applications are now being accepted for the 22nd annual Jazz in July Summer Music Programs held at the University of Massachusetts from July 7-18. Jazz in July is an intensive two-week, performance-based, jazz education opportunity where musicians from around the world can come together with Lituacuators to improve and share their style and craft. It emphasizes the approach of lectures, clinics, conversations, video screenings, performances and jam sessions.

The Instrumental Combo Program, led by the Billy Taylor Trio of piano, bass and drums, is a two-week session geared toward individual improvisation within a small instrumental combination. The participants will be assigned to combos and coached by the faculty, while attending classes according to their instrument. Vocal Jazz Soloists with Resident Trios is another two-week program providing vocalists with an opportunity to explore jazz phrasing and rhythm concepts, sheet preparation and vocal improvisation in a supportive environment. This session combines coaching sessions and classes with rehearsals and performance events.

For more information regarding this opportunity, as well as application information, call (413) 545-3530 or visit the website at http://www.jazzinjuly.com.

See tomorrow's paper for more community updates, as provided in The Source.

UMass drops pair in Hockey East

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If the flu bug that struck his most experienced goalie and several other members of his team doesn't make him sick, losing a pair of conference games this weekend might do the trick for Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon.

The Minutemen (14-13-1, 8-11-0 Hockey East) dropped two crucial games – and two season series as a result – to Providence, 5-3, and what may have been their worst performance of the year, a 9-0 drubbing by Boston College.

Providence stole the momentum away from the Minutemen at the end of each period – scoring two goals in the final 1:39 of the first and a breakaway goal by Devin Rask at 18:56 of the second.

"The goals at the end of the first and second period were agonizing. I thought our team played pretty hard most of the night," Cahoon said. "Do we have areas we have to improve in? Absolutely. But those three goals – the two at the end of the first and the one at the end of the second – killed us tonight and kept us from getting a job done. The kids came prepared to compete and turn around the bad performance [Friday] night and in many ways they did, but they just weren't thorough enough to get it done."

The Minutemen fell behind early against the Friars, as a Josh Hanson penalty off the opening faceoff gave PC (14-12-1, 7-9-1 HE) a chance on the power play. Jon DiSalvatore's one-timer from the slot zipped past Tim Warner (24 saves) low to give the Friars a 1-0 lead.

But the Minutemen stormed back with three unanswered goals over a 7:58 span to jump ahead 3-1. Thomas Pöck, Tim Turner and Greg Mauldin each put pucks behind Nolan Schaefer (29 saves) as the Minutemen relentlessly attacked the cage in the first. Turner's goal was his 10th career point, only the sixth Minuteman to do so.

A crucial moment came at 11:15 of the second, when PC's Jason Platt hit Craig MacDonald into the boards from behind. Platt received a five-minute major and a game misconduct for the hit, which gave the Maroon and White a golden opportunity. But UMass failed to get its man advantage set up fully, and a holding penalty by Pöck in the defensive zone at 14:45 ended the threat.

"We didn't get the puck movement that we are looking to get in a power play situation," Cahoon said. "And certainly it takes away [momentum] – you have five minutes you think maybe you're going to get some quality chances. I think we had one, maybe two quality chances in the entire five minutes. The kids have paid attention, worked hard in practice, but we have to get the power play executing the way it was a few weeks ago with a lot more puck movement."

Peter Fregoe converted the game's final tally at 17:32 of the third, after Warner made three consecutive saves on a three-on-one rush, but could not harness the final rebound.

"Timmy made some very good saves," Cahoon said. "You couldn't fault him on the goals. Would you have liked him to steal one? You always say that. But he made some really good saves and at the end there, he made some spectacular saves to keep us in a one-goal game. I'm not unhappy with his performance, he worked really hard, and certainly we could have played a little bit better in front of him to tighten it up."

Cahoon had much less positive to say about Friday's contest, as the Minutemen were dominated for nearly the entire game en route to a rout by No. 6 Boston College (16-6-3, 12-4-1 HE). Mike Waidlich started the contest, but was chased following the first period, and Warner provided the relief over the final two periods, as 12-game winner Gabe Winer was sick at home with the flu.

"Gabe's got a flu and we've got a bunch of kids that are banged up with that but that's nothing that other teams don't have to deal with at this point in the year," Cahoon said.

The line of Tony Voce, Ben Eaves and Stephen Gionta combined for 12 points on the night, with Eaves leading the way (2g, 4a). Gionta collected his first two career goals in the third period.

After jumping out to a 1-0 lead on a Justin Dziuma goal, BC's penalty kill took to the ice when Anthony D'Arpino went to the box for elbowing at 12:35. But instead of a UMass getting back into the game on the man advantage, BC scored a pair of shorthanded goals on two-on-ones to energize the Conte Forum crowd and deflate UMass' spirit. The Eagles went on to score three power play goals in the contest, avenging a 3-2 loss to the Minutemen on Jan. 3.

"We didn't play a solid game. I think it was more about what we didn't do," Cahoon said. "As much as I want to compliment BC on a really fine performance, we were marginal at best. We didn't play well in any one area and didn't play with the intensity that we needed to."

Transfer finally starting to come into his own

two days later with six points and three assists in the Minutemen's first A-10 win at George Washington. Cox finished the trip with seven points, four rebounds and three assists in the team's 83-55 defeat at Dayton on Jan. 29.

But he made an even bigger splash in Saturday's 70-66 win over Fordham. After Lasnie reinjured his ankle in the first half, Cox was forced to play the majority of the minutes at the two-guard. He answered with strong defense and the first double-double of his collegiate career – a 12-point, 11-rebound performance.

"Marcus Cox gave us a great contribution off the bench," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "It was great to see."

The difference in Cox's play has come in his willingness to let the game come to him. At the beginning of the season, he felt like he had to shoot 3-pointers from the shooting guard position now he is utilizing his own strengths on offense.

"I've talked to Marcus a lot," Lappas said. "He's a very good slasher. I told him to forget about the 3-point line, that it doesn't exist for him, and that slashing to the basket is what he does best."

And now that he's having more success on offense, the rest of his game – ball handling, defense – has seen improvement as well.

"This is as comfortable as I've played (this year)," Cox said after the Fordham game.

Cox, who saw his playing time diminish in favor of rookies Lasnie, Jeff Viggiano and Gabe Lee, understands that the young guys gaining experience will only help him in 2003-04.

"I'm a senior next year," Cox said. "I need these guys."

HONOREES

The UMass Hall of Fame Class of 2002 was introduced at halftime Saturday. The inductees were Boston Red Sox administrator Dick Bresciani, Doug Gruthcfield (basketball), April Kaiel (soccer), men's basketball all-time leading scorer Jim McCoy, Brian McIver (water polo, swimming) and Allyson Rioux (softball).

STARTING TO DOMINATE

UMass rookie Gabe Lee's 14 points against Fordham marked his third straight game in double figures and the fourth in his six starts.

Lee leads the Minutemen in shooting from the field with a 59.5 percentage. In five starts, the center is averaging 10.6 points, 5.4 rebounds and 2.2 blocks per game.

Team shows resiliency

pens to a team when one of its two leaders is erased from the lineup.

Yesterday, however, may have been exactly what the Maroon and White needed: a basement team in La Salle which, although it had a decent overall record (11-8) and a sub par conference record (3-5), was certainly among the weaker A-10 teams.

The dejected Maroon and White crew that walked off of the Mullins Center floor Thursday night was a memory at 2:00 yesterday. The squad came out energized, and even Ebony Pegues, who normally has what Nekole Smith calls "that look like the weight of the world is on her shoulders," was focused, communicating with her teammates as never before.

It was clear from the beginning that something had brought this team from the brink of another disappointing season and back to the way it played when it got off to its best start in 30 years. The result of Sunday's game cemented that feeling. The Minutewomen paced the entire game, did the dirty work in the paint and held a sizeable lead for the entire second half.

The Minutewomen even saw some quality play from people who were mere background players for the last month. Cindy Gonzalez scored seven points and helped to fill the void left by Nelson with three assists. Pegues played a high-flying, exciting game that led to 12 points for the senior and Jennifer Butler played her normal, solid game grabbing a game-high 15 rebounds, and adding 17 points of her own.

So how did the team that looked sluggish, unorganized, and uncharacteristically sloppy on Thursday turn into the machine that gave La Salle its sixth conference loss yesterday?

"I guess we finally smartened up," Gonzalez said. "We realized we have to try, rather than be content with what was going on."

"For me, it's all about dialogue," coach Marnie Dacko said. "They have to take part, they have to contribute. We had an unbelievable practice [Saturday], and we just talked."

Jen Butler showed why she is the nation's most prolific rebounder by grabbing 15 in yesterday's 66-51 win over La Salle.

"That's the clearest sign of new life in the maroon and white jerseys were the rebounding statistics. After being out-rebounded 102-101 in the last three games, the Minutewomen, who boast the nation's top rebounder in Butler, monopolized the boards yesterday. Most astonishing was the 19-6 edge they held on the offensive glass. After six halves of minimal inside presence after the shot, they were all but unstoppable inside against a team with three six-footers.

The revitalization was also evident on defense. UMass had only four steals and five blocks, but the real damage was done before the ball could get close enough to the basket. Time and time again, the Explorers were flirting with shot clock trouble, even losing the ball once to the buzzer. When they did get close enough, the Minutewomen kept most of the open shots from appearing – although there were a few occasions when a shooter was left alone for a long jumper – and created fast break opportunities that led to 11 of their points.

This made for a crew of happy, refreshed players after the game.

"We all decided that we have to refocus," Butler said. "There's a lot of season left, so we have to regroup."

Dacko said that there was no single event that brought the team morale back up, but it's clear that the personality of the squad has changed from unsure and agitated to carefree and focused.

"This is a great team," she said, smiling. "There are no conflicts. These are some of the finest human beings I've ever coached."

Renewed energy helps Minutewomen rebound

"We knew we had to come out a little more excited," Butler added. "We needed to respond to losing [Thursday night] and come out with a new sense of urgency, and we did."

The Maroon and White was able to find its sense of urgency from the opening tip, but was unable to shake the Explorers for much of the first half. Clinging to a 21-19 lead with just under five minutes to play in the first frame, the Minutewomen received a spark off their bench from guard Cindy Gonzalez. After hitting a 3-pointer to up the advantage to five, the freshman added a second triple just over a minute later that stretched the UMass edge to 11.

"[Gonzalez] was given the opportunity and she took it," Dacko said. "She hit big shots for us, and was aggressive off the bench and that's all I ever ask from her. She's one of those types who's not always eager to shoot, but she did tonight and it turned out well for us."

The Minutewomen found themselves nursing an eight-point lead at the half, and were unable to extend it beyond 11 for much of the first five minutes. However, a foul line jumper from Butler keyed a 12-2 run in which six players would score, including another big three from a reserve, this time junior guard Judit Zsedenyi, to make the lead 54-33.

The Maroon and White continued to receive aggressive play underneath, as senior forward Siiri Liivandi battled for six rebounds, four of which were offensive – both good for second on the team, in securing the big lead and eventually the victory.

"[Liivandi] helped us out a lot tonight," Dacko said. "She gave us a great effort on the boards, and that's really what we need: someone to take the pressure off of Jen, and she did that.

"Overall we bounced back exactly how I hoped we would. The desire was there, we had players doing what it takes to win, and that's all I can ask for. We played hard, so overall I was definitely very pleased with our performance tonight."

UMass finally beats lesser foe

Minutemen avenge earlier loss with win over 2-17 Fordham

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has struggled all year against teams that it should beat.

First, it lost to the New England Conference's Central Connecticut State 46-43 on Dec. 2. Then, the Minutemen (8-12, 2-6 Atlantic 10) fell to Lafayette, which was just 2-5 at the time with losses to the likes of Drexel and Binghamton.

Finally, after putting together three wins in a row against Rider (76-54), Marshall (81-56) and North Carolina State (68-56), the Maroon and White fell at Fordham, 80-67, in its A-10 opener on Jan. 5. Heading into that contest, the Rams were just 1-10, having lost 10 in a row since their opener at William and Mary.

After coming up short against three very beatable teams in December and January, the Minutemen were able to exorcise that demon while exacting revenge on the Rams, who sit 2-17 (1-7 A-10) after Saturday's 76-66 loss to the Minutemen.

UMass coach Steve Lappas changed his gameplan for the Rams this time around, focusing on Fordham center Glen Batemon, who took over game one's first few minutes with three quick baskets.

"[Batemon] set a tone over the first 15 minutes of that game that we never recovered from," Lappas said.

"His size (6-foot-11, 300 pounds) made us change the way we play the pick and roll. They pick and roll on every play, and we did a lousy job on it in the first game, but 1,000 percent better this time [UMass center] Gabe Lee was outweighed by 150 pounds, but he did a great job on Batemon."

Batemon did finish with 11 points and 14 rebounds for the contest but Lappas was pleased with the way his team played against the big man.

"He didn't have as good numbers in the first game, but he had a bigger impact," Lappas said of Batemon, who scored nine points and grabbed 11 boards in the first contest.

UMass led the game throughout the second half, but a 9-2 Fordham run over seven minutes and 20 seconds cut the deficit to 45-44 with 9:08 to go. The Rams looked to take the lead when a Drew Williamson 3-pointer rimmed out.

"That would have been a big boost for our club," Fordham coach Bob Hill said.

But it was the Minutemen who accelerated after the miss and pulled away with a 12-3 run. Gabe Lee converted a three-point play and Jeff Viggiano stole a Jermaine Anderson pass and jammed it home on the other side. And when Anthony Anderson drilled a 3-pointer on the next possession, the game was essentially over.

Fordham's Mike Haynes led all scorers with 19 points, while UMass' Jackie Rogers scored 18.

Marcus Cox and the Minutemen were able to stave off a late Fordham run and hang on to beat the Rams at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

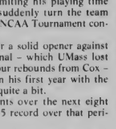
Transfer Cox finding his comfort level

Jim Pignatiello

His early-season struggles, which coincided with UMass' 1-5 start, made him the focal point of fan frustration.

When coach Steve Lappas benched junior Marcus Cox in favor of preseason Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Team member Mike Lasme, there was a sigh of relief from the UMass faithful. As if limiting his playing time would suddenly turn the team into an NCAA Tournament contender.

After a solid opener against Indiana at the Maui Invitational – which UMass lost 84-71 despite 14 points and four rebounds from Cox – the UConn transfer, playing in his first year with the Maroon and White, struggled quite a bit.



Cox averaged just 4.3 points over the next eight games and UMass posted a 3-5 record over that period.

"Earlier this season, my confidence was very low," said Cox, who currently ranks second on the team in turnovers (46) despite playing limited minutes since his move to the bench for the Dec. 28 matchup against Marshall. "It was a low point for me, but I'm trying to look past that. I think I've improved a lot."

Cox's improvement began to show up in games on UMass' recent road trip. While the team went just 1-2 on the trip, Cox was solid. No. 50 dropped 11 points in a 78-57 loss at La Salle on Jan. 22. He pitched in

High school not easiest path to college hockey

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

This is part four of a four-part series exploring the different paths taken to college hockey.

Chris Capraro takes the puck off a steal and into the neutral zone. As he hits the blue line, his opponent – a defenseman with an obvious speed advantage – catches up to him easily. But Capraro uses an impressive spin move and a deke to his left to open up a passing lane to the slot.

Capraro, physically, is not in good shape in the scope of the Massachusetts hockey team. But his talent is obvious to anyone who has watched the team this season – and it has shown up in opportune times, as he scored game-winners in come-from-behind victories against Boston College (Jan. 3rd) and Boston University (Dec. 6).

Only the most talented high school players can make the jump straight to college. With such a short season and such little access to weight training, the majority of high school players are not able to cut it physically at the college level right away.

"It does start to wear on you, but before you come in, you understand that the season is twice as long as it is in high school so you have to prepare yourself," said Capraro, who was one of Massachusetts's top high school scorers in his senior year at Austin Prep. "The guys are much stronger so at the beginning it took me a little while to understand that, so I had to come in and work much harder. It's mentally tiring, as much as it is physically."

While high school hockey features many players who eventually move on to Division I colleges, the major difference with high school hockey is the depth of its teams. The top-end talent may be very solid, but when it comes to the third and fourth liners, high school hockey talent falls off.

"[In college], there's four solid lines, eight defensemen that can play hockey," Capraro said. "In high school, there's two good lines, two not so good lines, two solid defensemen, two less solid defensemen.

"The speed's a lot quicker too, so it took a little bit to adjust to that also," he added. "Mentally, it's more of a sound game. Guys are a lot more skilled, they move the puck a lot better than in high school."

Capraro chose to stay in high school rather than play in the junior ranks, mainly because Austin Prep played in the highly competitive Catholic Central League. The Cougars struggled for many years, but under Capraro's leadership and head coach Bill Callahan, they have charged forward to become one of the best programs in Eastern Massachusetts.

"If it didn't turn around, I would have probably left and went to juniors or to a prep school," Capraro said, "but we kept getting better so I decided to stay because we were one of the best high school teams in Massachusetts."

Also, players coming straight from high school have to deal with the rigors of adjusting to college life without the comfort of having lived away from home, as in prep school, or playing a rigorous schedule with lots of traveling, like those from juniors.

"At first it was really tough, especially adjusting to school," No. 23 said. "Up until about the halfway point, it was really tough for me to be away from home especially."

Chris Capraro has found college hockey to be much more physically demanding than his time playing for Austin Prep High School.

UMass rebounds to cruise past La Salle

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

In watching her team fall to Rhode Island Thursday night, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko thought her team played flat, uninspired basketball in its first game since losing point guard Katie Nelson to a knee injury. On Sunday afternoon, however, Dacko could not have been more pleased with her team's tenacity and desire as the Minutewomen cruised past the La Salle Explorers 66-51.

UMass (12-8, 4-5 Atlantic 10) was able to outmuscle La Salle inside early and often, out rebounding the Explorers 54 to 28, including 19 offensive boards. Leading the way was senior center Jennifer Butler, whose 17 points and 15 rebounds were both game-highs. However, according to Dacko, the true difference maker wasn't found on the stat sheet.

La Salle	51

"The energy was back tonight," Dacko said. "I couldn't be more pleased with how we came out today, after playing like we did Thursday night, and hustled. We had players diving for loose balls, throwing their bodies around and giving themselves up for the team. It's the kind of basketball we want, and need, to play."

Without leader, team showing resiliency

The official losing streak was three. But it felt like a lot more, especially with point guard, leader, and offensive key Katie Nelson out of the lineup with the scariest two words to a female basketball player: knee injury.

For the Minutewomen, it began on Jan. 24. They came in to the Cintas Center in Cincinnati fresh off a runaway win against St. Bonaventure. And they played the Musketeers well – for about 35 minutes.

Next up were the Dayton Flyers. For 10 minutes, the game was even. UMass even started with a 12-2 run. But midway through that first half, disaster struck – Nelson went down with the injury that has her stuck on the bench until at least Valentine's Day.

Completing the trio of letdowns was Thursday night's contest with Rhode Island, a 66-57 loss that exposed what hap-

Cleanup for Shuttle Columbia

Debris scattered from Texas to West Virginia

By Pauline Arrillaga
Associated Press

NACOGDOCHES, TX (AP) – Using plastic bags and buckets, investigators went from rural schools to a college campus Monday gathering pieces of space shuttle Columbia strewn across a pine-cloaked disaster scene larger than West Virginia.

Search teams hunted down remains and debris in the rivers and woods of Louisiana and Texas, including a six-to-seven-foot chunk of cabin found in one rural county. Environmental and explosives experts along with NASA officials bagged up wreckage and transported it to airports now serving as evidence warehouses.

"We are collecting material that we find on the ground even as small as a quarter," said Gary Moore, a regional coordinator for the Environmental Protection Agency. "Obviously, you're going to get to a point where you can't collect every single speck."

Recovery teams were focusing on schools, noting that two in Nacogdoches County stayed closed Monday to keep children away from possibly hazardous debris.

Recovery teams gathered at a federal command post in nearby Lufkin to be dispatched to counties across the state, said Sue Kennedy, emergency management coordinator for Nacogdoches County. A seven-member squad was on the ground in Nacogdoches removing debris from schools.

Teams removed 25 pieces of debris from the grounds at Douglass School, whose 340 students in kindergarten through 12th grade stayed home for the day. They then moved on to another public school before heading to Stephen F. Austin State University.

Eventually, the pieces will be shipped to Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana, where they were being collected in a sprawling hangar. The goal is to try to reconstruct what's left of Columbia and to establish a sequence of how each part peeled off during the shuttle's ill-fated journey home.

On Monday, debris and human remains from the destroyed shuttle began arriving at the base "in everything from helicopters to rental cars," NASA spokesman Steve Nesbitt said.

NASA examiners and the independent investigative team headed by retired Adm. Harold W. Gehman Jr. have set up shop at the base in a room with a large map, using pushpins to mark the thousands of debris sites. The map was color-coded according to the size of the particles.

The recovery effort is daunting due to the size and scope of the debris field. It stretched west to east 580 miles from Eastland, Texas, to Alexandria, La., and north-south 230 miles from Sulphur Springs, Texas, to metropolitan Houston.

CHARLES REX ARBOGAST/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ricci Casserly of Houston breaks down and cries after placing seven roses and balloons as a memorial to the 7-member crew of space shuttle Columbia outside the main gate of the Johnson Space Center in Houston Monday, Feb. 3. The seven died when their spacecraft broke up on re-entry Saturday.

Louisiana state police confirmed more than two-dozen chunks of debris in 11 different parishes.

In Texas, Gov. Rick Perry said wreckage had been found in 33 counties sprawling 28,000 square miles of landscape – a territory marked by dozens of lakes and creeks and hundreds of thousands of acres of thick pine forest. That's 10 percent of the entire state and an area larger than West Virginia.

The area where wreckage was being found expanded westward Monday, said Michael Kostelnik, NASA deputy associate administrator. One debris collection center was opened at the former Carswell Air Force Base in Fort Worth, 180 miles northwest of the recovery command center in Lufkin.

Findings included a 3-by-3-foot piece of metal in a bank parking lot in Nacogdoches and a 1-foot diameter piece of gray metal in front of the courthouse. Among the more significant discoveries: a huge section of cabin discovered in a rural wooded area east of Nacogdoches.

County Sheriff Thomas Kerss would not disclose the exact location or provide details of what all was found, but said teams would continue scouring remote forests in the hunt for more cabin components.

He said federal agents were heading to a home to look for stolen shuttle parts. No arrests have been made, he said.

Kerss stressed that recovering the remains of Columbia's seven-member crew was a top priority. Authorities confirmed about 15 sites where human remains have been found in the county, Kerss said, again declining to provide details.

Some remains have been recovered in rural east Texas, and forensics experts think the astronauts could be genetically identified despite the orbiter's disintegration 39 miles overhead.

Kennedy, the Nacogdoches emergency coordinator, said the memory of the seven fallen astronauts drives workers in their search for answers to what brought Columbia down.

"Never, ever do we forget the true heart of this tragedy," she said, hoisting a notepad she carries throughout the day. Scribbled on a sticky note were the names of all seven astronauts.

Chancellor addresses student grief after space shuttle tragedy

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

As searchers picked up the pieces and fragments of the destroyed Space Shuttle Columbia, students both at the University of Massachusetts and nation-wide began the grieving process for the heroes lost in the disaster.

"Everyone one of us stood in shock and pain at the news of the Shuttle Columbia's accident on Saturday," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said in an open letter to the campus community.

"On Saturday, the risk became real, and the sacrifice that the word courageous implies became a painful recognition of the lives lost, the families devastated and our own faith challenged," he said. "Yet even in this moment of pain and even with the recognition of the personal and national tragedies these lost lives represent to so many, we know that the Columbia astronauts understood the risk, and that is the measure of their courage."

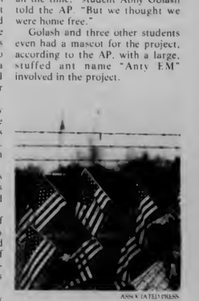
Flags flew at half-mast yesterday across campus in memory of the astronauts, according to UMass spokesperson Barbara Pitoniak. Pitoniak said the flags will remain at half-mast through Feb. 9.

At the Newman Center, plans were made for candlelight vigils every night through Feb. 9, said campus minister Jamie Cappetta.

"All of us in the University of Massachusetts Amherst community send our prayers, our support and the consolation that shared grief can bring the family friends and colleagues of the shuttle Columbia's crew," Lombardi said.

"Obviously we're saddened by it," Student Government Association Speaker Dan Saunders said. "Hopefully they'll figure out what happened to it, and it won't happen again."

Saunders said he thought the chancellor sending out an e-mail was a good first step toward connecting with reality.



"While it affects everybody, it's very difficult for students to make it almost real," Saunders said.

The Associated Press reported that students in Syracuse, N.Y., had a personal stake in the Columbia mission, with science projects they had worked on aboard the shuttle.

Four students from Syracuse had waited more than three years for an ant farm science fair experiment to fly into space.

"We knew that risks are present all the time," student Abby Golash told the AP. "But we thought we were home free."

Golash and three other students even had a mascot for the project, according to the AP, with a large, stuffed ant name "Anty EM" involved in the project.

Community service fair hosted today in Student Union

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

The Office of Community Service at Commonwealth College will host a community service fair in the Student Union today. There, dozens of organizations will offer students choices for community service.

"We get students credit for the learning aspect of community service," Jennifer Ann Donovan, an event coordinator, said.

The fair takes place from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Donovan said that many students come to the Office of Community Service looking to pick up a few credits by doing community service. The fair gives students who might be interested the chance to see what options they have for service.

"We have one every semester," Donovan said. "On average, we usually have about 60-something organizations attend."

Donovan said organizations at today's fair will include the Peace Corps, several animal shelters and the Holyoke Soldiers Home.

In the fall, about 375 people attended a similar fair.

"It was close to 400," Donovan said.

Donavan also made several suggestions to people who may be interested in attending the event.

"Go with something of interest in mind," she said. "Kind of have an idea of what you want to do."

At the same time, she added to keep an open mind.

"You never know what you will find of interest there," she said.

The fair also offers faculty members a chance to develop community service learning components in a course that they teach, according to Donovan. University employees who are interested in volunteering or learning about services provided by local organizations are also encouraged to attend.

The goals of the Community Service Learning Program are to empower students and communities through "real world interactions," bridge the thoughts and actions of students, offer insights and challenging contexts for academic learning and research opportunities, open up important career opportunities and provide enriched academic and small group collaborative experiences.

For more information about the community service fair or community service on campus in general, call 545-2015 or visit www.umass.edu/csl.

SGA plans for more budget cuts

How finances will affect students becomes top priority in discussion

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Budget cuts, fee increases and a new Recreational Center are in the future of the University of Massachusetts and on the Student Government Association agenda for the 2003 spring semester.

At the UMass community faces challenges of more budget cuts, members of the SGA are looking to the future and the needs of the students. Student Trustee Bill Powers explained to the Senate it must be proactive as it moves into the new semester.

"Romney's sent us the letter knowing that budget cuts will be coming, and that means lots of ramifications for our campus," Powers said. "Their have been rumors about space allocations and the possibility of Greek Affairs being moved out of Campus Activities, and the SGA needs to be proactive of who uses what space. We want to have student space, and we have to take action."

Members of the Senate agreed with Powers, noting budget cuts for the following fiscal year are beginning mid-February. Speaker Dan Saunders avidly explained to the Senate at last week's meeting on Jan. 29 that political decisions must not interfere with UMass student life.

"I've done a lot of worrying over budget stuff, and basically if budget cuts occur, we need to make sure that they won't impact students' lives in any significant way," Saunders said.

When and if such budget cuts are confirmed, Saunders added, the SGA needs to offer recommendations of where cuts should and should not be made on campus.

Changes currently in motion for the SGA are the re-installation of the previously cut H.E.X meal swipes. Dining Services had previously abolished the program, which allowed students to use their Dining Common's meal card swipes on campus. However, President Dave Carr explained that he is looking to have the service reinstated on campus.

Fee increases are also a reality of the future, as Housing and Dining Services have instated a five percent increase within student tuition. Carr said the increase is necessary due to inflation and enacting improvements on campus.

"I met with Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services, and Ashoke Ganguli, Director of Dining Services, and there are a lot of things they want to improve," Carr said. "Dining Services is looking to make improvements, and Housing Services wants to improve the elevators, and in order to do that, they need money, and this will help that."

A future UMass Recreation Center is in the process, and SGA members are looking to students in an effort to see where the UMass community would like to see it placed. Carr explained a survey will be handed out in order to get more student input.

"We're going to be putting out a survey to see what students would want to put in a Recreational Center, what it would be defined as and where student's feel it would best serve this campus," Carr said.

Members of the SGA expressed their confidence, but asked for student support.

"The SGA has an opportunity and the power to change things on this campus, and this power is activated when we have the student body behind us," Saunders said.

The SGA Senate will meet tomorrow, Wednesday, Feb. 5, at 7p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center. All meetings are open to the public.

The officer stopped the student, who denied having any books on her. When the officer asked the student to unzip her coat, she complied, and the stolen books were recovered. The student will be charged with larceny.

3:09 p.m.: A Gateway hard drive was reported missing/stolen from Tobin Hall.

3:26 p.m.: A caller reported he parked his vehicle in the Campus Center garage and came out to find the vehicle had been damaged by another vehicle.

4:28 p.m.: The University Store in the Campus Center reported that a person has been passing a number of bad checks at the store.

5:49 p.m.: APD called to report a possible fight at the intersection of Massachusetts Avenue and N. Pleasant Street. A UMass unit was requested.

8:48 p.m.: A medical emergency was reported at the Mullins Center. AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by ambulance.

Thursday Jan. 30

1:36 a.m.: The custodial staff reported an ongoing problem with a person in the Student Union.

3:49 a.m.: AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital after a medical emergency at UMPD.

1:17 p.m.: A person reported a car accident in Lot 12 on Forestry Way with a smashed grill, broken headlight and popped hood.

2:26 p.m.: A hit-and-run pedestrian car accident was reported on Stadium Drive near the "maze." According to UMPD spokesperson Jim Lyons, a small green pickup truck ran over a person's foot and drove away. The victim used a cell phone to call police. One witness on the scene reported that the vehicle was a late-model pickup truck. The truck was found the following day by a UMPD officer, who later interviewed the owner of the vehicle. The driver will be summoned to court for leaving the scene of a personal accident injury.

3:29 p.m.: A caller reported that someone broke into her car and stole a mini-disc player valued at $300 while the car was parked in Lot 12 on Forestry Way.

7:06 p.m.: Police responded to liquor law violations in Lot 50 near Patterson Hall and John Quincy Adams Tower. Police arrested Ben Maredia, 20, of 171 Fearing St in Amherst, for possession of alcohol while under 21 years of age and carrying a false ID card.

7:21 p.m.: Police arrested Jeff Desire, 24, of 122 Dustin St. in Brighton, Mass., in Coolidge Tower on a previous warrant for shoplifting.

11:03 p.m.: An officer reported a disturbance on University Drive. Assault and battery charges are pending in the case.

Friday Jan. 31, 2002

2:45 a.m.: A caller reported a group of individuals on the 17th floor refusing to quiet down and spraying people with a fire extinguisher. Damage was noted to the floor. An area check for suspects turned up negative.

6:38 a.m.: A fire was reported at Lincoln Apartments. AFD responded and extinguished a smoldering chair.

Bush unveils 2004 budget

By ALAN FRAM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush shipped lawmakers a $2.23 trillion budget for 2004 on Monday, bearing record deficits and seeking deep new tax cuts, an ambitious expansion of Medicare and bolstering security at home and abroad at the expense of domestic programs.

Though Republican majorities in Congress mean Bush's plans will get a better reception than last year's did when Democrats ran the Senate, some elements will clearly be reshaped, like his call for a fresh 10-year, $1.3 trillion tax cut. Whatever happens, the proposal sets the stage for a partisan battle over fiscal priorities likely to rumble right into next year's White House and congressional elections.

Democrats said the budget would deepen government debt just as it should be shoring up Social Security and Medicare for the approaching retirement of the 76 million-strong baby boom generation.

"Buried in President Bush's budget is a plan to dismantle Social Security and Medicare," said Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, the House Ways and Mean's Committee's top Democrat. "By demanding large tax cuts again even though there are no longer surpluses, the administration will starve the government of funds."

The president said his plan focused on the most important challenges facing the nation.

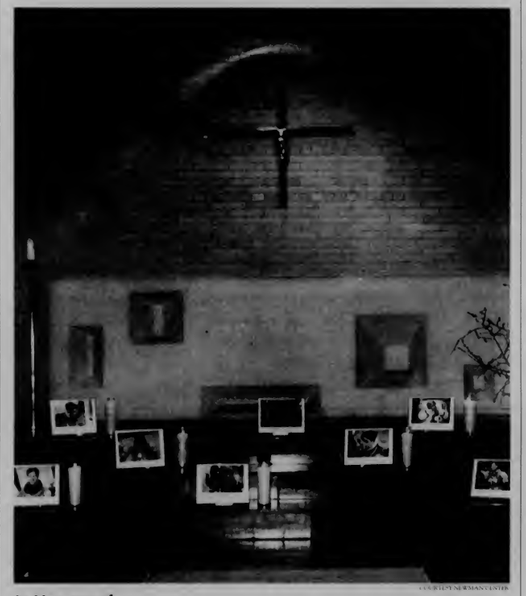
"A recession and a war we did not choose have led to the return of deficits," Bush said in a message accompanying the five-volume, 13.5-pound blueprint. "My administration firmly believes in controlling the deficit and reducing it as the economy strengthens and our national security interests are met."

One item sure to get special attention on Capitol Hill was Bush's proposal to give NASA a modest three percent increase to $15.5 billion in the fiscal year beginning on Oct. 1.

The budget, completed before Saturday's space shuttle Columbia disaster, included $3.97 billion allotted for the shuttle program. The administration said that was 4.7 percent more than it expected Congress to approve for 2003 when lawmakers finish this year's overdue spending bills.

The Justice and Labor departments were the only Cabinet-level agencies whose overall budgets would decline. But to contain burgeoning red ink, proposed cuts included some Army Corps of Engineers water projects, rural development, high technology aid to business and state grants for fighting drugs in schools and for clean water.

While Bush predicted last year that the government would dip its toe into deficits for just three years, Monday's spending plan acknowledged hefty shortfalls as far as the eye can see – a projection both parties fought to turn to their advantage.



Bush projected deficits of $304 billion this year and $307 billion in 2004, easing to $190 billion in 2008, the final year shown. Not factored in was a possible war with Iraq likely to cost at least 10s of billions of dollars.

The highest deficit on record was $290 billion in 1992, when Bush's father was president.

Less than two years after Bush projected $5.6 trillion in surpluses for the next decade. On Monday, he estimated $1.08 trillion in cumulative deficits for the coming five years alone. The budget mostly projected five years ahead instead of the 10 years as has been customary. Administration officials said longer forecasts are guesswork. Democrats said Bush was avoiding showing the full, bleak picture.

Powell to present evidence of biological weapons

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Secretary of State Colin Powell will present photographs of mobile biological weapons and transcripts of overheard Iraqi conversations to convince allies that Saddam Hussein has potent arsenals in defiance of U.N. disarmament demands, an administration official said Monday.

Powell sifted through classified U.S. intelligence on Monday to choose what he will make public on Wednesday to the U.N. Security Council. He is expected to display the photographs and refer to transcripts, an official told the Associated Press.

The chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) said he expected the evidence to show details of a transfer of technology from other countries and the relocation of weapons systems within Iraq.

"He can go into a level of detail with respect to the present maintenance of the stock that he hasn't gone into before," Hunter said in an interview.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.) who like Hunter has received intelligence briefings, said he would not be surprised if Powell disclosed to the Security Council information that had not been made available to Congress.

Rockefeller, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, said he had not seen enough evidence to justify war against Iraq. "At this point, I don't think it is compelling," he said.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain rallied anew to support the United States. "Show weakness now, and no one will ever believe us when we try to show strength in the future," he said as he prepared for a meeting Tuesday with French President Jacques Chirac, who is reluctant to go to war at this point.

As the administration sought to expand its network of potential coalition partners, Powell met with the king of Bahrain, Sheik Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa, who then called on Vice President Dick Cheney and planned to see President Bush at the White House.

Bahrain, which provides a base for the U.S. Navy's Fifth Fleet, was the target of long-range Scud missiles fired by Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War that reversed Iraq's annexation of Kuwait. Pro-government newspapers reported Sunday that the Arab nation was deploying Patriot missile batteries to counter any possible long-range missile threats.

Russian President Vladimir Putin said in Moscow there was no need for another Security Council resolution on Iraq but he would not rule one out – as Bush said he was not doing either.

"The inspectors need to tell us what more they need from Iraq – what else can be demanded of Iraq so their works could be more effective," Putin said.

His statement suggested Russia could be imposing more pressure on Baghdad, even though it favors a political solution.

Russia and France, both of whom have veto power in the Security Council, are prime targets for Powell, who said in an article published Monday by The Wall Street Journal that "we will not shrink from war if that is the only way to rid Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction."

From Baghdad, though, came another rhetorical blast of defiance.

Parliament speaker Saadoun Hammadi told a group of European legislators, "American aggression will end up in a catastrophe for them. They will incur casualties beyond their imagination."

Student arrested for possession of shrooms and pot

University of Massachusetts Police made an arrest Friday night after searching a room and finding marijuana and mushrooms in a residence hall room in Washington Tower.

"We got a call from the dormitory staff in Washington about a large party," UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons said. "They went up there and immediately there was a strong smell of burning marijuana."

Lyons said that a search warrant was obtained and applied to the room at about 10:30 p.m. After the search, police on the scene arrested Kevin. M. Doherty, 19, of Revere, Mass., and charged him with possession of a Class D substance (marijuana) with intent to distribute, possession of a Class C substance (mushrooms) and possession of alcohol while under the age of 21.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Literacy should be encouraged and not stifled by technicalities

Harry Potter has finally won approval from the church.

When J.K. Rowling's "Harry Potter" series was first released, many people denounced the books as evil. The books, which are about the exploits of a young wizard attending wizarding school, prompted religious conservatives to claim the writing encouraged children to engage in cult like activities. This was due to the magic spells and dark magic involved in the plot line. Up until this point, the Vatican had never issued a specific statement regarding the series.

In a recent press conference on a "New Age" spirituality document containing elements of the occult questions about the Catholic Church's stance on "Harry Potter" came up.

"I don't think that any of us grew up without the imaginary world of fairies, magicians, angels and witches," said Father Peter Fleetwood, a Vatican official who worked on the document.

"They are not bad or a banner for anti-Christian ideology. They help children understand the difference between good and evil," said Fleetwood.

This is the correct stance to be taking. The series should be taken as purely fictional. The "Harry Potter" series has sparked a lot of debate regarding religion and morality – a debate we hope will officially end with this statement.

What protestors were missing out on was that people weren't drawn to "Harry Potter" for the so-claimed dark magic or cult-like activities, but because they were simply well done pieces of children literature. The books should be viewed as entertainment and not anything instigating strange behavior in young children.

"Harry Potter" encourages friendship and core family values amongst its wide reading audience. The relationships between Harry and his friends are ones that are loving and sacred, both aspects of life that the church encourages and also pieces of life that should be encouraged amongst everyone, regardless of religion or race. Promoting magic doesn't necessarily mean the author is promoting devil worship. The children even celebrate Christmas during the course of the book series, and that would seem to be the antithesis of devil worship.

Something else also previously ignored is that the series has prompted thousands of children across the world to read. The story of Harry Potter has been a huge success among both children and adults. In a time where children are constantly bombarded with alternatives to reading, it's energizing to see how this series has drawn more into reading it.

Literacy is a life long habit that is best cultivated at a young age, and the "Harry Potter" series promotes such high standards and positive values amongst young children. It is refreshing that the Catholic church has finally made a clear statement on the books.

Recognizing heroism through all times

Andrew Merritt

There are certain people that come to mind when one thinks of a hero: firefighters, police officers, athletes, teachers, doctors.

Occupations that require a certain amount of strength in the form of human will. People that do the extra thing to make a difference in the world. Heroes make headlines, newscasts and coffee-table conversations.

Since the early 60s, astronauts have been among the many who become poster-ready, certifiable heroes. They still are, though they don't receive the kind of national spotlight they did when the United States was trying to be the first country to put one of its citizens on our friendly white satellite orbiting about 200,000 miles away. Ever since the early days of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, when men with clipboards and slide rules were hurling young test pilots up into the void to see if the impossible was really possible, astronauts have been heroes.

On Jan. 31, seven of those heroes began the rapid descent from space back to our terrestrial home. Riding in one of the most amazing and interesting inventions in all of history, they left the zero-gravity, hostile atmosphere of space and lined up their 22 year-old Columbia orbiter for what is usually an astonishingly soft landing, considering the giant craft is simply a glider when it re-enters Earth's atmosphere.

But something went wrong, and in the days and weeks to come, we will learn more it. What is known now is that an anomaly occurred on the left side of the Columbia – something that caused the temperature of the shuttle's skin in the area to heat up more than 60 degrees in five minutes. Shortly after, Mission Control at the Johnson Space Center in Houston, TX lost contact with the shuttle. Just 16 minutes from its scheduled touchdown time, the craft broke into multiple pieces in the azure sky over East Texas. Grainy home video captured the event as the single daystar of the returning orbiter puffed an extra bit of material into its contrail, and suddenly a number of smaller objects were apparent.

The silence of the video echoes just as the silence of the images captured on Jan. 28, 1986, when the Challenger shuttle exploded 73 seconds after liftoff. Just as it was on Saturday, the catastrophe was signaled by large puffs of smoke and then nothing as the two Solid Rocket Boosters sped off in different directions, unattached to a shuttle that was no longer there. In instants, the hopes and dreams of seven people were consumed, their potential contribution to history and science extinguished by a simple malfunction in one of the shuttle's many, many parts.

The history of American space flight is a proud one, highlighted by incredible achievements and acts of bravery. There are also a select number of incidents that should make us remember that although NASA gets it nearly 100 percent right every single time, there is nothing routine about space flight. On Jan. 27, 1967, the three astronauts of the Apollo 1 mission got into their Command Module for a routine test on the launch pad. Gus Grissom, Ed White and Roger Chaffee were in the middle of normal operations when a spark caused the inside of the oxygen saturated spacecraft to turn into a fireball. All three astronauts were lost, devastating the nation and the space program. An explosion interrupted the third moon-landing mission, Apollo 13, nearly costing the lives of the three space travelers inside. Their heroic efforts to return home were chronicled in a book by the flight's commander, James Lovell, which was turned into a popular movie.

But the reality of these heroes is far greater than what can be found in a history book or a motion picture. And it is the very same truth today, as the lives of the seven people lost in Saturday's horrific accident are mourned and remembered. They are heroes not because the movies made them heroes, nor because books and newspapers put into print the great things they accomplished. They are heroes, because they epitomize the human spirit and the want to push our own personal boundaries and see what's up there in the great beyond. They jump on top of a controlled explosion and ride it up into the heavens. They perform scientific experiments that will change our lives in ways we may never comprehend. They walked on the moon and gave us an answer to the question, "What's it like out there?" They challenged themselves and each other to stride farther than many of us can imagine and "touch the face of God," as former president Ronald Reagan said in his eulogy of the late Challenger crew.

> "They are heroes, because they epitomize the human spirit and the want to push our own personal boundaries and see whats up there in the great beyond."

We don't know much of what these brave people do anymore, because with near-monthly launches, space travel has become routine for human beings. We know we can get there. The mystery and danger that lies beyond our atmosphere has been diminished to obscurity by a public that no longer has the patience for science and discovery. As it takes such an awful tragedy to remind us of these people, it is simultaneously regrettable and promising, because it means we still have not lost touch with our fellow man or woman.

So as we learn more about these seven wonderful, smart, brave people, let us remember them alongside the others who have paid the greatest sacrifice for the ultimate endeavor. Let us reserve a space in our hearts for those who push the boundaries of what we can accomplish. Let us honor the memory of Commander Rick Husband, Pilot William McCool, Commander Michael Anderson, Specialists David Brown, Kalpana Chawla, Laurel Clark and Ilan Ramon by living our lives better every day and once in a while taking a look skyward and wondering about what's up there – knowing the price they paid shrinks in comparison to the legacy they leave.

Cures are not easily found in advertising

A New Year means a new you? This is doubtful at best. Every year, we watch the same ads for exercise equipment, dieting programs and the newest product to end nicotine addiction. But yet, what really changes?

Nothing. Nothing changes with the New Year. It's just another holiday letdown where only the knowledge that football season will soon be over is gained.

Courtney Charles

January is a senselessly dull and depressing month when you tend to regret living in New England and wished you were more of a basketball fan.

During this time of the year, my e-mail inbox is more crowded than usual with mail advertising Omaha steaks, "a slimmer you", debt consolidation, "giving her something bigger in bed" and the usual message from the department of corrections. However, I don't really want anything from Omaha – let alone a steak. Further, there's no "her" in my bed.

If any of this worked, all of us women would have the measurements of Tyra Banks and our pick of a population of heavenly endowed men with skill and high quality steaks.

But I don't need to tell anyone this is not the reality. We all know steaks go bad by the time they get to Massachusetts from Nebraska.

We all have our flaws or some area in our lives that could use some improvement – at least we think so. And the advertisers are quick to verify our thoughts. Yes, we should consolidate our debts; we should enhance our busts or our boards, depending on our anatomical equipment. We should lose another 10, 20 or 200 pounds, and while we're at it, we may as well laser every excess hair off our bodies.

> "We all have our flaws or some area in our lives that could use some improvement- at least we think so. And the advertisers are quick to verify out thoughts."

The world is on sale. Whatever your problem or concern, whether it's above the belt, below or somewhere in between, there is a magic pill or powder to cure it.

If only it were this easy. If only there were some magic potion to give me a 4.0 while I sit on my ass or some pill I could give to my ex-roommate to make her hair fall out.

But that's all just nonsense. The whole thing about a "new you" in the New Year is a sheer marketing ploy. Everyone feels like crap after putting on the holiday pounds and racking up the bills on the credit cards. The novelty of the holidays wore off as soon as you opened the 12th box of clothes from Walmart and found the wool sweater you loved in October is now an itchy and balled bane to your existence.

So with the idea of a new start, you feel like you can finally change something in your life. Advertisers convince you there is something less than perfect in your life and that they have the cure, readily available to you in exchange for a small sum in dollars and cents. You too can take off the holiday pounds, lose all of your debts and revitalize that wool sweater if only you sell your soul to the devil or a debt counselor.

January is not really a time for new beginnings, but a time of reevaluating your life. At this time, life slows down for many of us, and for the period of the deep freeze, our lives stand still. We should really ask ourselves if there is not something within us that needs to be revamped or revitalized to give us a new lease on life.

In the dreary depths of yet another New England winter, I've watched endless parades of daytime soaps in my lazy lethargic state and dream of warmer days. Let's face it: the winter is as tired as Anna Nicole's implants, and I am just so sick of the frigid arctic cold.

The winter is a drug that makes me tired. It makes me feel like joining the bears in a merry old hibernation. I feel slow and lack my usual energy. I'm not motivated to do anything. As soon as I step outside each morning, my muscles freeze, and my drive is gone.

What I've taken all this time to say is January sucks. It completely and utterly blows. There's nothing to do (if you're not into winter sports) but sit around and decay on the couch and pick yourself apart.

I like the snow and all, but this deep freeze business is beyond my level of tolerance. I guess the potion I'm really looking for is a cure for apathy and pessimism.

In January, everything is dull and nasty. The holidays are a puffy dream of the past with a future of the infamous yellow snow. So I'd like to put a question out there for the advertisers.

Where's my cure?

Making 'aliyah' in a troubled land

The French philosopher Camus said, "In the midst of winter, I finally discovered that there was in me an invincible summer." To paraphrase Camus, at age 21, I recently discovered I was Jewish and proudly so. Though many issues regarding my identity are still unsolved, one has become apparently clear. I am Jewish; now hear me roar.

"Bring a bullet-proof vest," advised my friends and family as I originally participated, as a lark, on a free 10-day adventure to the magnificent land of Israel during winter break. My concerned Jewish mother counted the days to my return as she watched CNN. I embarked on my journey to an embattled holy land a few days after Christmas with a basket full of emotional, spiritual, religious and personal missions to conquer and eventually overcome.

Allison Leshefsky

When I returned to the United States, I realized the extreme culture shock I had suffered during this nonstop, short-lived, 10-day trip. Shockingly, for the first time in my life, I was the majority.

I recall my mentality a few days before the trip. It was Christmas day, and I gathered with all of the Jews throughout the nation for Chinese food and a movie downtown. To the best of my ability, I had temporarily removed myself from the widespread consumer paradox that overtakes this country every December. As in previous years and many years to come, I was just another lonely Jew on Christmas.

> "I was walking on the land that we have seen all too often on CNN."

A few days later, I boarded El Al, the country's only and most prestigious airline for my flight to Israel. Abiding by Jewish law, which observes Shabbat, the airline served us only kosher foods. After a gruesome interrogation process conducted by the Israeli government to single out possible terrorist suspects at the airport, I was aboard the aircraft, and en route to the land of milk and honey. However, my journey to Israel began at the terminal in Newark airport, where I stood among others just like me, with dark features and curly hair. If only I knew at the time that my adventure into the land in which my people truly live was just beginning, then I wouldn't have been so taken back at the time.

After an anxious 12 hours aboard the plane, I stepped onto the land my grandfather has always spoken about in my youth, not long after coming to the United States as a Holocaust survivor. It was the land written about in the Bible, the Koran and the Hebrew Torah. I was walking on the land we have seen all too often on CNN.

For the first time in my Americanized Jewish life, I was accepted here as a Jew. I received the land skeptically through the eyes of a teenager who was thrown out of Hebrew School and hasn't stepped foot into a synagogue since my Bat Mitzvah at age 13.

In Israel, I was free from being confronted with subconscious anti-Semitism (despite innocent curiosity), which I became so accustomed to in my earlier years as a Jew growing up in a predominantly gentile suburb of Boston. I was no longer a victim of peculiar reactions toward my religion, such as statements like, "Whoa, you are Jewish," followed by phrases like, "So, uh, that means you don't celebrate Christmas?" Such dialog is usually followed by looks of shock and amazement – as if I am some freak about ready to perform some kind of ritualistic tribal dance.

As I traveled from as far north as the Sea of Galilee to south of Jerusalem, my left-wing liberal mentality was conflicting further and further with my Judaism. I found myself caught in a Catch-22. Although I never witnessed first hand the ugly hatred in the hearts of two peoples, I could smell the tension in the sweetness of the air.

With mixed feelings and in a crowded Jerusalem hall, I heard the Prime Minister of Israel, Ariel Sharon, speak to my group of Jewish Americans. "Make aliyah," he said, using a Hebrew word used to refer to the return of the Jewish people to Israel. Though simply put, those two words represented a mutual longing.

This land that I was taught in my youth to yearn for in my heart also yearned for me.

Yet Ariel Sharon is a right-winger and in some quarters considered a perpetrator of war crimes against the Palestinians. Of this I am clear; as a Jew, I support the right of self-determination by Jews to establish a geographical homeland in Israel, just like every other nationality in every other country. At the same time, I believe that Israeli Jews must make peace with their Arab neighbors, especially the Palestinians. As a supporter of Peace Now, I see the need for the creation of a Palestinian State in the West Bank and Gaza and would like to see Israelis exhibit a spirit of generosity in trying to bring about an end to suffering. While hideous wrongs have been committed on both sides, we are left with only one alternative: "All we are saying is give peace a chance."

About Gittes

Producer of 'About Schmidt' is looking for some Oscar loving, and he just might get it

By Nikolas P. Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Harry J. Gittes is flipping through his 1958 copy of the Index yearbook reminiscing about his years at the University of Massachusetts – Amherst.

One thousand students were enrolled at the University and tuition cost him about $50, says Gittes, calling from his home on Mulholland Drive in Los Angeles.

Gittes, now 66, is the same age as Warren Schmidt, the character in "About Schmidt," the film he produced.

Gittes, a producer currently based at Columbia Pictures, says this is the first time he has been able to apply his major of sociology and minor of psychology to work.

"This has been the first time that my major in college has become useful," he says while laughing.

Schmidt (Jack Nicholson) is a retired insurance actuary who feels his life is thoroughly unimpressive. His wife Helen (June Squibb) dies suddenly after 42 years of marriage, and he races through the Midwest in a Winnebago to prevent his daughter Jeannie (Hope Davis) from marrying a waterbed salesman (Dermot Mulroney).

"I was the only one committed to the project that was the same age as Schmidt," says Gittes.

Directed by Alexander Payne, 41, who also made 1996's "Citizen Ruth" and 1999's "Election," "About Schmidt" has received both critical praise and commercial success.

Entertainment Weekly's Lisa Schwarzbaum named it the best movie of the year and called it "personal moviemaking at its most accomplished." So far, the film has grossed more than $40 million at the box office.

Not bad for a man who was washing dishes in the SDT sorority house during his years at UMass.

Unlike Schmidt, however, Gittes, who lived in Baker, Greenough and later in TEP fraternity house, says his turn as producer in "About Schmidt" is a career high.

Asked how he became producer, Gittes answers, "I got in that position because someone gave me the book called "About Schmidt." and I read it and thought this would be good for Jack. Jack read it and said, 'This would be good for me.' And I got Alexander Payne on it, and he said 'Yes, I would be interested in developing it.' It's really Alexander Payne's movie."

Gittes, who is a long-time friend of Nicholson's, has worked on several projects with the actor. In fact, Gittes is the namesake for one of Nicholson's most memorable characters – Jake Gittes in 1974's "Chinatown."

"When I go home to his house, sometimes there's people like Mick Jagger there," says Gittes.

"I think for Jack it's one of the top five performances of his career and that says a lot," he says.

Critics think so too. Nicholson won best dramatic actor at the Golden Globe Awards, and the film received the screenwriting award for Alexander Payne and Jim Taylor's adaptation of Louis Begley's novel, among other awards from respected film critics' circles.

Oscar buzz has also been mounting for "About Schmidt," especially for Nicholson's performance.

If Nicholson earns another Academy Award nomination on Feb. 11, he will become the only leading man ever to be nominated 12 times.

Insiders also expect Payne and Taylor to receive a nomination for best-adapted screenplay and Kathy Bates to receive a nod for best supporting actress.

Gittes started his career as a photographer and advertising copywriter in New York and experienced "a natural progression into movies." As a photographer, he shot such then-promising stars as Jack Nicholson, Elliott Gould and Liza Minnelli. He also shot album covers and acts at The Bitter End Rock Club in Greenwich Village, which included such performers as Woody Allen, Louise Lasser, Cass Elliot and Bill Cosby.

Gittes went to Los Angeles in 1970 to produce the TV pilot for Bill Cosby's animated series "Hey, Hey, Hey, It's Fat Albert," which proved to be his full-time entrance into film and television production. He went on to work at BBS where his feature credits included production designer and co-producer of "Drive He Said," directed by Jack Nicholson.

As an independent producer, Gittes made such films as "Goin' South," starring and directed by Jack Nicholson; "Harry and Walter Go To New York," directed by Mark Rydell; "Timerider," directed by William Dear; "Little Nikita," directed by Richard Benjamin and starring Sidney Poitier and River Phoenix; and "Breaking In," written by John Sayles and directed by Bill Forsyth, which was the closing night feature of the 1989 New York Film Festival. He has also made movies for television including "Dangerous Company," directed by Lamont Johnson and starring Beau Bridges, which Gittes executive produced. In addition, he was involved in the development of Alex Cox's cult classic "Repo Man," in which he maintains a partner interest.

Gittes was born in Brookline, Mass. and is married to entertainment attorney Christine Cuddy with whom he has two children, Michael, 15, and

Phish does justice to classic rock

It seemed to be the right look, the right fit – the only costume, perhaps, a band as boundless as Phish could convincingly don: the art of a stranger, worn for one evening, at least, as its very own.

The prospect of an assembly such as the one the band cureted on Oct. 31, 1994 is a daunting one – if not for the adventurous four-piece in question, than certainly for us as listeners. Covers are a secure part of rock tradition – imitation being flattery and all – but an album's worth in one sitting? Nestled between sets of its own design, Phish took the seminal work of another – the Beatle's "White Album," which remains one of rock's most diverse statements of substance and style – and clinched in, back from its own imagined U.S.S.R. before fading out to the vocal drone of "Revolution 9." They exorcised all 29 songs from their familiar context – 29 songs that comprise the most schizophrenic set ever laid down in one place. And they've just released it as a four-disc set. The question then: why bother when the genuine article can be had for the same price?

Matt Despres

Phish has always been at its best when shooting from the hip, its audience only too happy to splash behind in the uncertain wake. The musical jaunts spearheaded by guitarist Trey Anastasio, bassist Mike Gordon, drummer Jon Fishman and keys player Page McConnell strike some as pretentious and others as inspired – a form of divine intervention into a Greater Rhythm that these four from Vermont have somehow keyed into. Musical preferences aside, as both individuals and a collective, there's little room to debate the raw chops they bring to the table. Anastasio can dial a lick for most occasions, Gordon a note for every mood and Fishman – perhaps the most accommodating one of the bunch – stars as the true utility player, arranging his own style on the fly as his band plays on with joyful uncertainty.

But back to The Beatles. Can a quartet of unique talents even mimic the atmosphere created by the t.A.T.u in right lane with first release

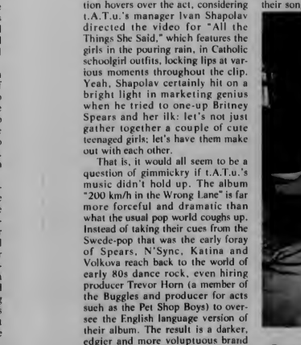
Russian pop duo t.A.T.u. is made up of two cute-as-a-button teenage girls – redheaded Lena Katina and brunette Julia Volkova. Both sing chirpy, club-friendly songs, but the girls have gotten more international press for their embrace of lesbianism rather than their music.

t.A.T.u. '200km/h in the Wrong Lane' Interscope



However, this whole angle just came off as a gimmick, a clever way to sell a teen-pop act after the collapse of the bubblegum genre. The scent of exploitation hovers over the act, considering t.A.T.u.'s manager Ivan Shapolav directed the video for "All the Things She Said," which features the girls in the pouring rain, in Catholic schoolgirl outfits, locking lips at various moments throughout the clip. Yeah, Shapolav certainly hit on a bright light in marketing genius when he tried to one-up Britney Spears and her ilk: let's not just gather together a couple of cute teenaged girls; let's have them make out with each other.

That is, it would all seem to be a question of gimmickry if t.A.T.u.'s music didn't hold up. The album "200 km/h in the Wrong Lane" is far more forceful and dramatic than what the usual pop world coughs up. Instead of taking their cues from the Swede-pop that was the early foray of Spears, N'Sync, Katina and Volkova reach back to the world of early 80s dance rock, even hiring producer Trevor Horn (a member of the Buggles and producer for acts such as the Pet Shop Boys) to oversee the English language version of their album. The result is a darker, edgier and more voluptuous brand of dance pop than anything Spears or Christina Aguilera could hope to achieve.

Despite Shapolav's video, there isn't much titillation on display on "Wrong Lane." The t.A.T.u. girls avoid coy references to being a genie in a bottle needing to be rubbed the right way in favor of sincere explorations of more adult thematic material. Trips to the mall and puppy love crushes are forgone; instead, themes of alienation, loneliness, attraction, the desperate search for affection and the pain of being different from the rest of society are explored. Katina and Volkova use their songs to plumb depths not seen on of most dance-floor friendly teen albums. The whole lesbian thing probably was just an attention-grabber on Shapolav's part, but the girls use the idea to genuinely look at the issues surrounding being abnormal and different in the modern world. When the girls of t.A.T.u. pleadingly ask their parents if they lost their minds on "All the Things She Said," it's far more effective than when Spears sings about how she's not a girl, not a yet a woman.

The house-heavy electro-blast of "Not Gonna Get Us" kicks off the album, which soon after launches into its best track, the urgent "All

Despite weak plot, 'Narc' is saved by strong acting and directing

COURTESY IMDB.COM

Starring Jason Patric and Ray Liotta, 'NARC' has somewhat of a weak and repetitive plot but is saved by strong and gutsy direction from Joe Carnahan.

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

"Narc," director Joe Carnahan's gritty version of the well-worn terrain of the police drama, plunges us right into the action almost immediately, swooping us right into a jittery chase scene without stopping to explain the whos, whys or hows of what is actually happening. The camera shakes and rattles and plows forward with propulsive, breathless zeal; we can barely make out who's chasing who, nor can we stop to rest. When the action finally stops in the middle of a children's playground, bullets are fired and the man being chased lies dead, while a pregnant woman screams in agony as she rolls around in a pool of blood. A stray bullet has hit her fatally close to her unborn baby.

'Narc' Directed by Joe Carnahan Starring by Ray Liotta Jason Patric Paramount Rated R 102 mins.

It's a brilliant set piece to kick off a cop film, and the beauty of the startlingly bruising "Narc" is that, for the most part it, captures the rough intensity of the opening. Carnahan's film isn't a polished, slick buddy cop flick along the lines of "Lethal Weapon." Rather, the movie takes its cues from antiherok films such as "The French Connection" and "Serpico," in which the line between cop and vigilante becomes a very fine one, and the cities they protect are nothing more than dead zones of urban despair. The movie is set in a cold, damp, wintry Detroit and like Eminem's "8 Mile" turns the city into a concrete wasteland built from crumbling, graffiti-littered buildings and gray skies that threaten to devour the landscape with a blanket of smothering darkness.

Nick Tellis (Jason Patric, in a role that taps into his natural broodiness) has been suspended for 18 months following the shootout that left the pregnant woman without child. He's called back into action by his superiors to investigate the brutal beating and murder of an undercover cop. The dead cop's partner, Henry Oaks (a bullish Ray Liotta), is determined to find the killers and put them behind bars – no matter the cost.

Unlike most recent cop thrillers, Carnahan's film walks a morally ambiguous line when it comes to Oaks and Tellis. There are no heroes in this movie – just two cops who will do anything to get their job done. Interestingly, Carnahan doesn't present his antiheroes as bad or as dirty cops. They are dedicated, almost too dedicated, to the job – cops whose allegiance to upholding the law results in them sometimes crossing a moral and ethical barrier.

For much of the movie, "Narc" has a raw, brutal power. A lot of it comes from Liotta, whose frighening performance as Oaks has mesmerizing electricity about it. Liotta gained weight for the role, and he seems to tower over everyone else in the film. He exudes enough brute force paired with laser-point cunning that he seems to fill every frame he's in.

Carnahan employs visual tracks, such as split screen, to tell his story, but the window-dressing doesn't compromise the film's force. Carnahan hurtles the film along, and as we thrust forward into crack dens, chop shops and grotty apartments, we feel a visceral rush that has been long missing from the cop film. The cinematographs of Alex Nepomniaschy has a drained look to it, as if all the life and hopes has been slowly squeezed from Detroit itself.

But there's a problem. Carnahan can certainly direct a movie with gut-force brutality, but his central mystery is desperately lacking. It's something about stolen guns and police pensions, but it's kind of hard to care. We've seen this stuff all before, and the only original thing is Carnahan's direction. For all of Carnahan's street corner forcefulness, we realize that we are being treated to the sequences we have all seen before – the stakeout in the rain, the troubled family life – being treated as if they were something bold and new, when they are far from it. His qualified stars and slashing direction help to hide that this story has been retold to death. By the end, you wish that Carnahan had given himself a better backbone.

THEATRE

WEST SPRINGFIELD, Mass. – The Majestic Theater will present "Judgment at Nuremburg," a play adapted for Tom Randall's National Actors Theatre by Abby Mann.

The play is set in 1948, during the second chapter in the Nuremburg trials. The story follows the trial of Ernst Janning, a renowned author and scholar who stood as a great figure in the German judicial system and the Minister of justice under the Nazis.

Show dates will be Thursdays, March 6 through April 3. Matinees will be performed at 10:30 a.m. for a $10.00 general admission price.

APPLICATIONS

AMHERST – The University of Massachusetts Department of Comparative Literature is seeking submissions for its ninth annual publication of "mOthertongue".

"mOthertongue" is multilingual periodical that provides Five College graduates and undergraduates with the opportunity to express themselves through poetry, prose, lyrics, essays and artwork. The project's objective is to create a mutual awareness and respect for various cultures and the unifying similarities of creative expression.

The deadline for submission is Feb. 14. Submissions can be sent to "mOthertongue," 303 South College, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Mass. 01002. The author's contact information and a translation of the original work should be enclosed. Submissions will not be returned unless a self-addressed, stamped envelope is included.

Contact mOthertongue@email.com for more information.

HARTFORD, Conn. – Deadlines are closing in on the auditions for Connecticut Opera's Resident Artist Program, which will be held on Saturday, Feb. 22. The application is due Friday, Feb. 7.

The audition will require artists to sing an aria of their choice and be prepared to sing additional arias if asked. In the selection, a variation of style and language is key and at least one aria in English should be included. An accompanist will be provided unless participants opt to audition with their own.

A complete application consists of a resumé and an 8-by-10 original photograph. No scanned or computer generated images will be accepted. If selected to audition, applicants will be notified by phone.

The Resident Artist Program runs from September through May and pays a weekly stipend. The program conducts educational and outreach performances and weekly vocal coaching to its participants. Performance and understudy opportunities in main stage productions are also provided.

Interested vocalists can contact Dian Erikian, the Auditions Coordinator, at (860) 527- 0713 ext. 307 for more information.

ART GALLERY LISTING OF EVENTS

AMHERST – Hampden Art Gallery at UMass will present "The Laver Cake Project" and Karen Moss' "Keep it Simple" from Feb. 2 through Feb. 28. Also being presented at the gallery is the New England/New York/New Talent 2003 exhibit. This will be presented from Feb. 2 through March 10. Gallery hours are Monday through Thursday noon to 6 p.m. and Sunday 2 to 5 p.m.

NORTHAMPTON – The Forbes Library Gallery will be presenting Cynthia Fisher's "Mosaics in Good Humor" from Feb. 1 through Feb. 28.

The gallery will also showcase Margot Glass' "Nature in Repeat", which opened Saturday Feb. 1 and remained throughout the month.

For more information regarding both events, contact the Forbes Library Gallery at (413) 587-1013.

the Things She Said." Industrial textures interestingly get folded into the mixture lending a heavier, crunchier sound then expected, as demonstrated on "Said" and the whirling, fervent dance rock of "Show Me Love." The girls quiet down on the icy, lovely piano piece "30 Minutes" and demonstrate good taste by throwing in an enjoyably glossy remake of the Smith's classic "How Soon Is Now?"

Alas, "Wrong Lane" may possibly be too short; only 11 tracks long, with one a "Show Me Love" remix that adds nothing and two Russian language versions of other songs as well as a filler song or two. The girls' voices occasionally pitch into dog whistle range, so abhorrers of such vocalism may want to steer clear. But "200 km/h in the Wrong Lane" is otherwise a breathtaking melding of electro, rock and pop that trumps all comers with a dance floor pedigree.

Phish cover stunt does justice every time

Fab Four in a studio some 30-odd years ago?

In spirit, yes.

Phish knows what it's ultimately mounting here is a one-night stand and enjoys the three-plus hours of pleasure without the constraints of a guilty conscience. It doesn't tread lightly for fear of scarring sacred ground; Phish walks right on through, as it should. That freedom results in some truly inspired (and sloppy) moments. Anastasio meets George Harrison's leads with his own tendencies resulting in an appropriate blend of gently weeping British blues and of-the-moment improvisation. "Sexy Sadie" bleeds with just the right amount of irony and weariness that John Lennon intended, and "Savoy Truffle" gathers enough of its innate silliness to get by.

The gentle "Dear Prudence" and "Cry Baby Cry" hold similar positions at opposite ends of the album, and here the hand treats them both with equal care. Likewise, the album is land-marked with pure goofball moments – the perfect foils for Phish to ground itself in. "Rocky Raccoon," "The Continuing Story of Bungalow Bill" and "Martha My Dear" sound as fun to play here as they were to listen to the first time around.

Whimsy and appreciation can't alone hold the tent, however. "Helter Skelter" won't sink the ship by itself, but – as the heaviest offense Paul McCartney ever launched into the face of his own leaning toward saccharine pop – it's sadly deconstructed in a gumbo of discord and missed cues. It rarely missteps that badly, though – through the haze of improvisation and lazy vocals shine the qualities that substantiated the album in the first place: great songs, clever arrangements and the bold decisions to pitch avant-garde workouts next to pop constructions. Phish runs with and furthers the novelty here – a good time in the end, no more or less.

They went on to pull the stunt three more times, inching through every groove and side of The Who's "Quadrophenia." The Velvet Underground's "Loaded" and the Talking Heads' "Remain In Light." It was the "White Album" that was first, though, and the "White Album" that made sense – the most diverse record from history's most influential act, spun through the mind of today's most amenable band.

Wild first half sets up playoff chase in NHL

BY IRA PODELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SUNRISE, Fla. (AP) – The first half of the NHL season featured two teams in bankruptcy, seven teams with new coaches, and two final scores for one All-Star game.

What's up for the second half?

Well, Glen Sather began his first full week as coach of the New York Rangers on Monday. The team's president and general manager took on his added role Thursday when he replaced Bryan Trottier, fired 34 games into his first season.

Sather, who coached Edmonton to four Stanley Cups in the 1980s, has vowed to get the Rangers into the playoffs for the first time since 1997.

"He'll do fine," said Philadelphia coach Ken Hitchcock, who wanted the Rangers' job last summer. "He's not afraid of dealing with accountability issues. He's not afraid of taking risks."

The Rangers have the NHL's highest payroll, yet are 11th in the Eastern Conference – 21 points behind Eastern Conference-leading Ottawa. The Senators have been on top for much of the season despite a payroll crisis and bankruptcy filing.

The Senators, though, are just two points ahead of the New Jersey Devils and seven ahead of the Philadelphia Flyers.

"All you need is a 4-0 run, and you're right back in there," Hitchcock said.

In the lower portion of the conference, only nine points separate the eighth and final playoff spot and the No. 4 Flyers.

"Getting into the playoffs is hard, and getting into the playoffs is everything," Hitchcock said. "It's very difficult when only eight teams are getting in."

No spot is safe, as only nine points separate fifth place from being left out.

Hitchcock led Dallas to the 1999 Stanley Cup and lost in the finals a year later. He was fired last season and replaced by Dave Tippett, who has the Stars on top with the most points in the NHL.

Tippett will further rely on his All-Stars to keep things rolling. Marty Turco was the key for the Western Conference in Sunday's All-Star game. He gave up just one goal in the third period and then allowed only Atlanta's Dany Heatley to beat him in the decisive shootout that left the final score 6-5. 3-1 in the penalty shot-style tiebreaker.

That was after the final score was first announced as 8-6, when the NHL temporarily had the shootout goals included in team and individual totals. That later was changed.

Turco has been a pleasant surprise this season. He was given the starting job in Dallas after Ed Belfour left for Toronto.

In just his third NHL season, Turco leads the league in goals against average (1.79) and is second in save percentage (.931). He has helped the Stars to 72 points, the most in the NHL, and first place in the Pacific Division.

The refreshing look of the Western Conference promises more surprises in the final 30 games.

Instead of wondering whether Patrick Roy and Peter Forsberg will lift Colorado to home-ice advantage throughout the playoffs, the question is whether captain Joe Sakic can heal in time to get his team into the postseason.

The Avalanche already have endured the firing of coach Bob Hartley, who led the club to the 2001 Stanley Cup. Now they are trying to hold on to eighth place under rookie coach Tony Granato.

They trail the surprising Minnesota Wild and Edmonton Oilers. The Wild will look to ride the fine talent of 20-year-old Marian Gaborik to their first playoff berth. The Oilers are only four points behind Stanley Cup champion Detroit.

And then there's San Jose, a promising club with a mediocre record. The Sharks fired coach Darryl Sutter during a first half that started with holdout players.

Back in the East, the Buffalo Sabres hope the second half finally lands them an owner other than the NHL, which has been running the club. The Sabres joined the Senators in bankruptcy court, but are practically in a different league when it comes to play.

The Sabres were able to stay above the bottom, but they were caught before the All-Star break by the suddenly rejuvenated Atlanta Thrashers.

Atlanta and Buffalo are tied for the fewest points in the league at 41 each. The Thrashers brought in Hartley, after Colorado let him go, and he already has started teaching them how to win. Having rising stars Heatley and Ilya Kovalchuk is helping.

The 22-year-old Heatley, who leads the Thrashers with 49 points, will rejoin his team following a four-goal performance in the All-Star game.

"Been good so far," Heatley said. "Atlanta's playing better. It's getting better every day."

Mauldin nominated

Up for Walter Brown Award

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Though it has made its presence known across the nation as a squad, the Massachusetts hockey team has had plenty of individual accolades as well. The latest on that list is sophomore Greg Mauldin, who was nominated as one of 12 finalists for the Walter Brown Award.

"It's definitely an honor to be up for the award," said Mauldin of the award, which has been won in the past by such NHL-ers as Brian Leetch and Chris Drury. "We'll see what happens. If I don't win it's no big deal, but it's nice to be nominated."

The Walter Brown Award is given annually to the top U.S.-born college hockey player in New England. Seven players – including Boston College's Ben Eaves, New Hampshire's Mike Ayers and Northeastern's Mike Ryan – from the Hockey East conference are in contention for the honor. The award is America's longest standing honor given to college hockey players.

While Mauldin was pleased to be named a finalist, team success is still first and foremost in his mind.

"It shows that we are getting better as a team because I couldn't do it without my teammates," he said. "You can see we're getting better with the individual accolades we've received and hopefully there's more to come in the future."

Despite only being a sophomore, Mauldin has already racked up 56 points in his UMass career – good for 33rd on the school's all-time list.

"To get it as a sophomore is a great honor, knowing that there's a bunch of kids in the New England area that are American born. So to know that they chose me as a finalist, it's great to know," said Mauldin, who is 11th in Hockey East in overall scoring (32 points) – fourth in Hockey East contests (23).

Mauldin was also named a runner up for the conference's Player of the Month Award, which went to Eaves. The sophomore scored five goals and posted eight assists in nine games in January. He has won the ITCH Player of the Week Award twice this season (on Dec. 2, for posting eight points against the trio of Vermont, Princeton and Dartmouth, and two weeks ago, for scoring points on four of his team's five goals in a split with Northeastern).

Some might think when the trophies start piling up, a player might get lackadaisical, but according to No. 14, individual awards can make someone play even harder.

"You try to shrug and move on, but as the same time, if you get individual awards, people are going to be gunning for you," Mauldin said. "It makes you play better, because everyone's watching you. It's a driving factor if anything."

UMass sophomore Greg Mauldin leads the team with 32 points, 15 goals and 17 assists. The Holliston, Mass. native is the first Minuteman to break 30 points in a year since the 1999-2000 season.

UMass swim teams suffer different fates

By Nick Wright
Collegian Staff

Over the winter break and this past weekend the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams have competed in several dual meets and three team invitational events.

On Saturday, both squads competed against Fordham in Bronx, N.Y.

The Minutemen defeated the Rams 179-112, whilst the women's team suffered a 189-110 point defeat.

Standout performances for the Maroon and White came courtesy of seniors Justin Houck and last week's Dinn Brothers UMass Athlete of the Week and Atlantic 10 Athlete of the Week, senior tri-captain Ryan Zaucha.

Zaucha, who won the award for his victories in the 200-yard backstroke and 200-yard individual medley against George Washington the previous weekend, tallied victories in the 200-yard backstroke in a time of 53 minutes, 29 seconds and the 100-yard butterfly in 53:43 seconds on this occasion.

Zaucha was also part of the victorious 200-yard medley relay team along with sophomores Matt Woodward, Dylan Smith and Ryan Matthews.

Houck, meanwhile, finished first in the 1,000-yard freestyle in at time just under 10 minutes and the 200-yard breaststroke in 1:56:31.

The Minutemen also won four other events during the course of the meet.

Sophomore Brandon Doane placed first in the one-meter dive with a score of 245.85; junior Connor Townsend was victorious in the 200-yard butterfly in at a time of 1:58:35; fellow junior Peter Tawczynski won the 100-yard breaststroke in 1:01:24 and Dylan Smith was first in the 200-yard freestyle in a time of 1:45:93.

Only two members of the Minutewomen were victorious on the day against the Rams.

Junior Christian Dexter dominated the breaststroke events winning both the 100 and 200-yard events in times of 1:08.23 and 2:26.05, respectively.

The only other member of the Maroon and White to place first was senior Kate Allery, who continued her fine run of form which had seen her named A-10 Performer of the Week for Jan. 19 and Dinn Brothers UMass Athlete of the Week for the week of Jan. 12.

Allery placed first in both the one and three-meter dives against the Rams with totals of 286.42 and 219.75 points, respectively.

The split against Fordham has continued a worrying trend, which has seen the Minutewomen lose their last four dual meets – against St John's, Northeastern, George Washington and now Fordham. The run stretches back to Nov. 23.

This leaves them with an overall record of 1-5 in dual meets this season with the sole success coming against Boston University way back in early November.

The Minutewomen have only one meet against Boston College on Saturday to come before the A-10 Championship takes place in Buffalo, N.Y. between Feb. 20 and 22.

The Minutemen, conversely, have been victorious in the last two dual meets against Fordham and George Washington and have an overall record of 4-1 in dual meets. Their only defeat came against St John's in late November.

Like the Minutewomen they have just one meet before the A-10 Championships also against Boston College, this Saturday at home in the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. Pool.

Strange time to flock

Gabe Lee (with ball) and the UMass men's basketball team will take a game off from their Atlantic 10 schedule to travel down south Wednesday for a contest with the Southeastern Conference's Tennessee Volunteers.

UConn coach Jim Calhoun diagnosed with prostate cancer

STORRS, Conn. (AP) – Connecticut men's coach Jim Calhoun has prostate cancer and is leaving the team for up to a month for surgery and treatment.

"I want to attack this thing," Calhoun said Monday at practice. "I want to get it out of my system, and I want to fight this like I've fought everything else in my life. I'll win this battle, and with my family and the love and prayers of everybody, be back on the sidelines soon."

The 60-year-old coach will take a three- to four-week medical leave, with assistant George Blaney taking over on an interim basis. Surgery was scheduled for Thursday.

Calhoun's doctor, UConn Health Center urologist Peter Albertsen, said the cancer was detected early and was "relatively low-grade."

"Coach Calhoun's condition appears to be very treatable, and we anticipate his return to normal job-related activities within three or four weeks," said Albertsen, who will perform the operation.

Now in his 17th season at Connecticut, Calhoun has led the Huskies to national prominence, peaking with the 1999 NCAA title. With a career record of 637-290, including 14 seasons at Northeastern, Calhoun is eighth among active Division I coaches.

The 18th-ranked Huskies (13-4, 4-2 Big East) play Wednesday night at Virginia Tech. They're coming off a 95-71 loss to Boston College on Saturday, their worst loss ever at Gampel Pavilion.

"We can handle what we have to handle," said Blaney, who's in his second season at UConn after 22 years as head coach at Holy Cross. "He's one of the strongest guys I ever met. I know that he will fight it – that's not been a question."

Calhoun learned he had cancer Friday and told the team shortly before meeting with reporters Monday.

"My mouth just dropped," said guard Taliek Brown. "All my prayers are with him. Everybody will just play his hardest for him."

"He said he just wanted us to play hard," guard Tony Robertson said. "He said he has enough people praying for him to get better. Basketball is the least thing he should be worrying about right now."

Manning calls Vanderjagt 'idiot' during Pro Bowl

HONOLULU (AP) – Peyton Manning called teammate Mike Vanderjagt an "idiot kicker" at the Pro Bowl, three days after Vanderjagt apologized for making disparaging remarks about the Indianapolis Colts quarterback.

Manning made the comment Sunday during a live interview on ABC. He also claimed Vanderjagt was "liquored up" at the time of the Canadian cable TV interview earlier this week in which he said Manning should show more emotion.

"Here we are," Manning said. "I'm out at my third Pro Bowl, I'm about to go in and throw a touchdown to Jerry Rice, we're honoring the Hall of Fame, and we're talking about our idiot kicker who got liquored up and ran his mouth off.

"The sad thing is, he's a good kicker. He's a good kicker. But he's an idiot."

A message from The Associated Press was left at the office of Vanderjagt's agent, Gil Scott, on Monday.

Vanderjagt also criticized Colts coach Tony Dungy in the interview with The Score, a Toronto-based cable sports network.

"I'm not a real big Colts fan right now, unfortunately. I just don't see us getting better," Vanderjagt said during the interview.

"Coach Dungy, he's just a mild-mannered guy. He doesn't get too excited, he doesn't get too down and I don't think that works, either. ... I think you need a motivator, I think you need a guy that is going to get in somebody's face when they're not performing well enough."

Vanderjagt, the most accurate field-goal kicker in NFL history, apologized Thursday to Dungy, Manning and the rest of his teammates. He signed a $7.75 million, five-year contract extension with the Colts in November 2000 – at the time making him the league's highest-paid kicker.

Red Sox sign utility player Merloni

BOSTON (AP) – Utility infielder Lou Merloni nearly doubled his salary to $560,000 Monday in a contract agreement with the Boston Red Sox that avoids an arbitration hearing.

Merloni made $290,000 last season when he hit .247 with four homers and 18 RBIs in 194 at-bats over 84 games. The Red Sox had no hearings this year as all four players who were eligible agreed to one-year contracts.

Anticipating arbitration, the team had offered Merloni $450,000 while he asked for $625,000. He can increase his earnings by achieving certain performance bonuses.

Merloni, 31, has battled for a roster spot ever since joining Boston in 1998. For his career, he is hitting .271 in 258 games with nine homers and 77 RBIs. He should have competition again after Boston acquired infielders Bill Mueller, Todd Walker and Damian Jackson in the offseason.

Last year, Merloni started 47 games at second base and played every position except pitcher, catcher and center field. The right-handed hitter batted .321 against lefties and .217 against righties.

Service Fair offers involvement for students

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Correspondent

The Annual Community Service Fair took place from Tuesday afternoon in the Student Union Ballroom. The fair, which presents information about community service opportunities and volunteer openings for University of Massachusetts students, was organized by the Office of Community Service Learning.

Nearly 90 organizations participated and hundreds of students were able to access otherwise little known information about different projects available in western Massachusetts.

Among the organizations participating were Big Brothers-Big Sisters, Arcadia Wildlife Sanctuary, Northampton VA Medical Center, Tapestry Health of Amherst, The Boltwood Project, and the Peace Corps.

"The point of the fair is to help UMass students find services that they would like to volunteer for," Ester Mezy of the Community Service Learning Office said.

"Last year, there were over two hundred people that came to the fair. Some of the most popular organizations are things like The Boltwood Project, Habitat for Humanity, and the Girl Scouts of America," Mezy said.

The Hampden County Sheriff's Department offers the chance to help tutor inmates, work as a counselor's aide in the women's unit, or assist a paralegal in the Legal Resources Department.

Most organizations require anywhere from one eight hour commitment to a four hour commitment once a week for a year.

Most every spokesperson assured that the ages and backgrounds of volunteers range from high school and college students to 80-year-old retirees.

"Sometimes, volunteering is just about supporting a cause that you believe in," Rachel Phillips of USDA National Resource Conservation Service said. "I personally used to help at a karate school. The place doesn't have a big budget, so I help out. It's fun to work with the kids."

Many organizations are willing to help college students who wish to gain more experience in the field of their major. In the organization that Phillips represents, volunteers are Soil Science or Agricultural majors who want to learn more about conserving natural resources, technology assistance to farmers and helping with the Public Soil Survey.

Other such organizations include The Soldiers Home of Holyoke for Pre-Med majors, Arcadia Wildlife Sanctuary for Wildlife and Fishery majors and the Nonotuck Community School for Education majors.

For Maura St. John of the Massachusetts Special Olympics, community service does not necessarily have to relate to your major. St. John is a UMass senior who was recently accepted to veterinary school. In her spare time, she coaches a basketball team of thirty Special Olympics players. Teammates consist of both people with disabilities and regular UMass volunteers.

"The best part of volunteering is that it's such a stress relief. My kids are the greatest people in the world. I get to see them grow not only as athletes, but socially as well. We love just hanging out and playing together."

The majority of volunteer positions are open to anyone, and no immediate experience is necessary. Many organizations are more than happy to provide training for volunteers if needed. For instance, Tapestry Health of Western Massachusetts is a non-profit Family Planning Clinic. Its volunteers are trained to prep the lab, file charts, record lab results, order medical supplies, and may even design their own independent project.

"The volunteers get to grow too," St. John said.

Most all of the organizations presented at the fair are located in either, Amherst, Northampton, Holyoke, or the Western Massachusetts area. For more information on community service opportunities in the Five College area, call the Office of Community Service Learning at 545-2015.

Digital Library allows students easier access

By Dan Baker
Collegian Correspondent

Online access to an extensive list of electronic journals, digital course packets, the ability to renew books from home and 24-hour research and technical help are just a few of the things now offered by the University of Massachusetts Library's website, also referred to as the "Digital Library."

So far, the most used feature of the UMass Digital Library has been the over 160 online databases and journals, accounting for almost sixty percent of all traffic to the library website. The databases offered allow users to search for a wide range of material, providing information on anything from the latest opinions of the U.S. Appeals court to the full text of the Massachusetts building code.

Another feature added early during the fall semester was "Ask 24/7." This feature allows students and faculty members to talk to a librarian through the library website regardless of the time of day. The service can provide answers to reference questions and also help users find the materials or information which they are seeking.

"What we are trying to do is make it [Ask 24/7] a virtual reference desk," Jay Schafer, associate director for content and acquisition said. "Obviously we are not going to write the term paper for you at the reference desk, but we will certainly help you use the catalog, the electronic materials or answer ready reference questions."

The E-reserves have been another important addition to the Digital Library. Starting as a pilot program last spring, the E-Reserves have made it possible for professors to post course materials – such as course packets – online for students to access. The idea behind the E-Reserves was to make it easier and cheaper for professors to deliver the necessary information to their students. The program caught on faster than anticipated according to Emily Silverman, library communications specialist, who said she was surprised to discover that last semester over 11,000 students enrolled in the system.

Other features of the Digital Library include allowing users to renew and reserve books and search through the library catalog and request books through an interlibrary loan. One number ideas on the horizon is open linking.

"What open linking allows you to do is once you get into a citation for a journal article, you can just click on the link and if we own the text in one of our databases it will bring up the full text of the article for you," said Schafer. "This will really help students take full use of our resources."

To aid designers who crafted the new site, small focus groups were conducted to determine the needs of the average user. These surveys showed that users were looking for a more "Google-like" way of getting information, according to Schafer. "It has become a goal to have a more streamlined presentation, a clean and

President pays respect to astronauts lost on Shuttle

Thousands turn out to mourn at memorial

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) – Under sapphire blue skies that once held Columbia and her crew, President Bush paid tribute Tuesday to the shuttle's seven astronauts and rededicated the nation to space travel.

"They go in peace for all mankind. And all mankind is in their debt," he said.

The president joined at least 10,000 teary-eyed NASA workers, aging astronauts, political leaders and families of the fallen crew for a memorial service in a plaza outside Mission Control usually reserved for celebrations of space triumphs.

The shuttle broke up Saturday as it was returning to earth. In Bush's words: "Their mission was almost complete, and we lost them so close to home."

The president met with family members after the service, which ended with the ringing of a Navy bell seven times, one for each of the deceased astronauts and a "missing man" formation flyover: four T-38 NASA jets roared above the crowd, with one peeling away and soaring high and out of sight.

Bush bowed his head and first lady Laura Bush wiped tears from her eyes as the United States Navy Band Sea Chanters led the crowd in song. The words to one hymn, "God of Our Fathers, Whose Almighty Hand," were printed on the back of the service's programs, allowing the NASA family to raise its voice in tribute to "shining worlds in splendor through the skies."

Leading the crowd in prayer, Harold Robinson, a captain in the Navy's Chaplain Corps, said the astronauts found true humility while viewing "our little planet from outer space."

Fighting back tears, NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe then declared, "Today, our grief is overwhelming."

He promised to find out why Columbia broke apart, correct the problem and make sure it never happens again. To the families of those lost, he said: "We will keep this solemn pledge."

Bush recalled that Navy Capt. David Brown, a medical doctor aboard Columbia, was asked several weeks ago by his brother what would happen if something went wrong with the mission. "This program will go on," the 46-year-old Navy flight surgeon replied.

"Capt. Brown was correct," Bush said. "America's space program will go on."

Earlier, aides said the president supports continuing the shuttle program, despite criticism by some.

At the Johnson Space Center, crew members were remembered in separate eulogies that shared with the world their nicknames, habits, likes and dislikes and, in many cases, their near-last words.

O'Keefe recalled that mission specialist Kalpana Chawla, 41, told Mission Control how beautiful the Earth looked from miles above as she summoned her fellow crew members to the shuttle window, where the world was reflected in her eye.

"It is this image, the image of Columbia's crew joyfully joining Kalpana to see our beautiful planet reflected in their friend's eye, that we will remember and treasure forever," O'Keefe said, his voice cracking.

The president spoke briefly about each astronaut as their smiling faces looked down from a picture of the crew placed on stage.

Chawla, a native of India, wanted to reach for the stars, Bush said, and "she went there and beyond."

Col. Ilan Ramon, 48, son of a Holocaust survivor and Israel's first space traveler, spoke of the quiet of space and was quoted by Bush as saying, "I only hope that the quiet can one day spread to my country."

Navy flight surgeon Laurel Clark, 41, liked to say, "Life continues in a lot of places."

Air Force Col. Rick Husband, the shuttle commander, 45, loved the hymn "How Great Thou Art," which includes the phrase: "I see the stars, I hear the mighty thunder. Thy power throughout the universe displayed."

Columbia pilot William McCool, 41, was a Eagle Scout and "fearless test pilot," Bush said.

And, finally, payload commander Michael Anderson, 43, who Bush said recently told his pastor, "If this thing doesn't come out right, don't worry about me; I'm just going on higher."

"Our whole nation was blessed to have such men and women serving in our space program," Bush said.

"This cause of exploration and discovery is not an option we choose; it is a desire written in the human heart," the president said. "We find the best among us, send them forth into unmapped darkness,

Student Government Association meets tonight to talk of Campus Activities veto

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Members of the Student Government Association Senate will convene tonight and revisit last week's presidential vetoed and tabled motion regarding Campus Activities event planning policies.

The veto made by President Dave Carr was the first in four years. The motion, which was originally passed by the Senate in November, requested that Campus Activities state within their Policies and Procedures handbook that it is recommended that event plans would to be turned in six weeks prior to the event. Carr vetoed the motion based on the grounds that the motion was illegal under Massachusetts' law.

Carr stated in last week's meeting that the motion was found illegal when presented to Campus Activities.

"The state says that you have to have a certain amount of time and 48 hours does not cut it when planning events," Carr said.

Senator Daniel Pozmanter presented the motion again to the Senate requesting that they override Carr's veto. However, after brief questioning, the motion was tabled due to a lack of information.

Dan Saunders stated that due to the new information, a new motion will be presented.

"They made some changes within the motion and now it's going to be a different motion, so the veto stands," Saunders said. "I know that they rewrote some of the wording so it should be interesting."

Budget cuts have been a primary concern of members of the SGA. Recently released was a $3.1 million cut at the University of Massachusetts. Saunders explained that he will address the issue with the Senate, as well as meeting with administrators to see what areas of campus will be affected.

With budget cuts also comes SGA budget allocations. As members of the SGA Ways and Means committee are preparing to release their own fiscal student activities budget in early spring, the senate must consider their funds.

"I think that sometimes the importance of the Student Activities budget gets left to the side, but Chair Brian Thompson and his committee have been setting up workshops and getting disks done," Saunders said. "We're allocating $1.6 million and any student who has attended a student life event on campus, minus athletics, has reaped the benefits of all the hard work the SGA puts into this budget."

Aside from motions and budget cuts, members of the SGA are also looking towards the SGA Presidential and Student Trustee elections. A referendum question will be presented a second time discussing whether Greek housing is deemed off campus or on-campus residential.

A referendum question was on the Spring 2001 ballot, though not passed by the student body. This recognized Greek housing as on-campus, non-residential housing facilities.

However, due to two years of complications, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs wrote a statement defining Greek area housing under commuter district for the SGA.

"The issue is not as cut and dried as people make it out to be and the number of seats allocated to the Greek area depends on whether or not they are considered on or off campus housing," Saunders said. "It's an important question that was worded very badly two years ago so hopefully they can get that fixed up for this election. We want these questions to be student decisions not someone else's."

Other issues to be addressed at tonight's meeting will include by-law changes to the SGA Constitution. One change is regarding a motion passed by last years Senate and pray they will return. They go in peace for all mankind, and all mankind is in their debt."

"Yet, some explorers do not return. And the loss settles unfairly on a few," he said. "The people of NASA are being tested again."

Afterward, in his private meeting with family members, Bush told them, "I'm sorry that we have to meet under these circumstances. God bless you all."

The president and first lady were accompanied on Air Force One by astronaut Neil Armstrong, the first person to walk on the moon; former senator and astronaut John Glenn, the first American to orbit the world, and his wife, Annie, also were aboard.

Digital Library makes information accessible at greater expense clear presentation, one that will ultimately give results," he said.

This redesign has also caused a shift in the direction of the library budget. Over the last two fiscal years the library has spent more on electronic resources then on books. In addition, during the current fiscal crisis the budget for electronic materials has been one of the only two within the library to increase rather then decrease.

Silverman feels, however, that electronic material has become a necessary part of the modern library and these are the costs that come with it.

"There was a point in time when telephone systems weren't seen as second nature. Now it's become the cost of doing business; of course you have a telephone system," Silverman said. "I think we are very close to the point in time, if not in fact there, where maintaining the Digital Library is the cost of doing business, where it is as essential as the phone system is now."

Despite the success of the Digital Library, Schafer said he does not think the conventional library will be going away anytime soon. "We don't want to lose sight of the fact we have three million volumes available here and journals that are not available full text online."

regarding the fee allocations of the Asian, Latino, African and Native American (ALANA) caucus reserves fund. The motion was failed by the administration; however it was printed in the 2002-2003 SGA Constitution.

"There was a motion presented last year regarding the ALANA reserves and it made it so the ALANA caucus would allocate the funds, however it didn't go through and former Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos sent it back," Saunders said. "However it went through and is in our by-laws so I'm going to be talking about that and there should be some interesting comments."

The SGA Senate will be meeting tonight at 7 p.m. in room 174 of the Campus Center. All meetings are open to the public.

Powell expected to show evidence to U.N. today

HUSSEIN MALLA/ASSOCIATED PRESS

U.N. weapons inspectors, wearing protective clothing, and Iraqi workers leave a shed at the al-Doura station for water purification in Baghdad, Iraq, Tuesday, Feb. 4, 2003.

BY BARRY SCHWEID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) – Secretary of State Colin Powell will be joined by top CIA officials today as he presents the U.N. Security Council with evidence culled from classified material to try to convince wavering allies and other nations that Iraq has defied calls to disarm.

The evidence is expected to include transcripts and possibly recordings of intercepted conversations of Iraqi officials discussing the country's weapons programs. There probably also will be images taken by satellites of suspected biological weapons labs, officials said.

Powell's report also is expected to indicate that Iraqi officials had advance knowledge where U.N. weapons inspectors were going to look, in line with a recent report from the British government that said Iraqi intelligence had bugged inspectors' telephones and hotel and conference rooms.

CIA Director George J. Tenet and his chief deputy, John McLaughlin, are expected to accompany Powell. In selecting evidence, Powell and intelligence specialists are said to be taking care not to reveal more about their operations than they could safely show Iraq.

President Bush and his top national security officials have said repeatedly that Iraq will be forcibly disarmed if it does not comply with U.N. resolutions demanding that it reveal and give up weapons of mass destruction.

Arriving in New York on Tuesday, Powell met first with Chinese Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan, whose government prefers a diplomatic approach to Iraq rather than using force to disarm President Saddam Hussein.

The chief U.N. weapons inspectors, Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei, are due to visit Baghdad for two days of meetings next weekend. Among their demands is access to Iraqi scientists and other officials without government "minders" auditing the interviews.

Blix said Tuesday at the U.N. that it was "five minutes to midnight" and Iraq must be forthcoming about its weapons during the visit. "I don't think that the end is there, that a date has been set for an armed action, but I think that we're moving closer and closer to it," Blix said.

In Iraq, meanwhile, U.N. arms investigators found another empty chemical warhead, the 17th discovered since mid-January. The Iraqis have said the empty munitions found earlier were overlooked leftovers from the 1980s.

Saddam, in an interview broadcast Tuesday, denied his government has a relationship with al-Qaida or has weapons of mass destruction. He said it would be impossible to hide such arms.

A retired British lawmaker, Tony Benn, conducted the interview Sunday in Baghdad for a yet-to-be-launched Arabic TV station with administrative offices in London.

"If we had a relationship with al-Qaida, and we believed in that relationship, we wouldn't be ashamed to admit it," the Iraqi leader said.

Before and after Powell's speech today to the Security Council, he intends to meet with foreign ministers and ambassadors from most of the other members.

Besides Powell's presentation today, all 14 other members and Iraqi Ambassador Mohammed Al-Douri are expected to make statements to the council in what could be a critical test of sentiment for using force to disarm Iraq.

Powell hopes his evidence will persuade the council that Iraq has caches of chemical and biological weapons, nascent nuclear weapons and long-range missile programs and ties to terror groups.

Even Tuesday, senior intelligence and security officials were still deciding what information Powell would provide.

He is expected to accuse Iraq of harassing scientists and others who have useful information and to criticize Iraq for denying the inspectors permission for flights by U-2 reconnaissance planes.

The emphasis on links to terror groups is designed to draw support from France, which views al-Qaida as more dangerous than Iraq.

But British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has supported the Bush administration on using force as a last resort to disarm Iraq, failed again Tuesday to persuade a reluctant France to join a U.S.-led coalition.

President Jacques Chirac, during talks with Blair in France, said he remains adamantly opposed to a war without giving U.N. inspectors more time to search for outlawed weapons.

Also on Tuesday, Bush talked by telephone with Russian President Vladimir Putin for about 15 minutes.

Both France and Russia have veto power in the Security Council.

Trying to avoid knee jerk reactions

There is a problem that people find themselves involved in after major events – tragic or otherwise – and after this weekend's Columbia tragedy we find ourselves with swinging legs.

The "knee jerk" reaction of boosting the NASA budget is typical of this shock based reaction.

Bush has proposed, and has been championing, a $500 million budget increase for the overlooked science program. This is a noble thing, since the NASA program at one time brought man to space.

We have allowed NASA to fall through the cracks; there is no doubt about that.

We had a magnificent vision and accomplishment of what we had done: we made it to the moon, we orbited the earth, we made such great strides that in some ways we outgrew earth.

So in our upgrade of ourselves, we reached these new heights, but the magnificence has died. Now we can find the story of a shuttle launch on the inside pages, or stuffed deep inside the science section.

With the exception of John Glenn's reunion tour, or Mir, or tragedies along the lines of this weekend's, or 1986's Challenger, we don't see NASA on the front page.

So whether by design or by default, space travel has taken the back seat in the public eye. The flights still happen and the experiments still go on, but for whatever reason we don't fret about it.

But now we see a change, and what a change.

Without downplaying the tragedy or making anything less of this weekend's horrific accident, we need to take time to look at everything before striding forward.

So President Bush, in doing just the opposite, only fed the idea of knee jerk reactions and by doing so perpetuated the trend.

There is no harm in increasing the budget, in fact if nothing else the death of seven astronauts has reminded us that we have a successful and quite impressive space program and perhaps it merits an even larger budget.

But what this weekend's events should have included is some forethought.

With Bush's bolstering it obviously didn't.

We, as Americans, have been dipping in and out of economic woes. Over the past few years we have seen declines in spending – on the part of consumers, not necessarily governments – and worries over the general economic health of our country.

With these tragedies, with these lingering problems, we hope to achieve some sort of fiscal sense, and to some degree we have.

So let us exercise this fiscal sense, this economic safety check, with everything, especially $500 million dollar price tags.

The exploration of space will continue. However, so must everything else here on Earth.

The pleasures and perils of plastic

Regan McKendry

Seven inches. You know the t-shirt I'm talking about. It's the one spoofing the logo of that famous convenience store, and it's all yours just for signing up for some credit card. While it may seem like the perfect idea, just signing your name to receive a t-shirt, one should think more carefully about what they're getting into. Credit cards are not toys, though they can be fun.

I don't want to admonish people against using those beautiful pieces of plastic. As all my friends would attest, that would be the ultimate case of the pot calling the kettle black. I would like to offer tips to those of you though who are new to the game of buy now pay later.

I must confess, the first credit card I ever received was in exchange for a cheap item. I was at the 1999 Major League Baseball All-star Fanfest in Boston and wanted a commemorative duffle bag. What I ended up getting in return was a Mastercard with a limit of only $2,500. I had also entered into a contract with MBNA. Now I'm sure they provide adequate service for a lot of people, but it just wasn't what I was looking for. Anytime I had a question and called into one of those telephone centers, I had to go through more hoops than I would at Whitmore. They officially lost me though, when I found myself signed up for a magazine subscription I had never committed to. It was successful at getting rid of them, but the people were not helpful at all.

This is in sharp contrast to my experiences with the J.P. Morgan Chase Company that backs my other two Mastercards. Anytime I've had an issue or a question, they bend over backwards to make me happy. I also have much more generous credit limits on both my accounts. My only gripe is the constant attempt to get me to sign up for protection services, but I can deal with that.

Now I'm sure some of you have horror stories with Chase or would kiss the ground that the CEO of MBNA walks on. It makes no difference to me. What does matter is finding a bank that you have a good relationship with. After all, this is your credit rating and your future. Shouldn't those who can have a great impact on your financial abilities down the road be people you trust?

As this is your future, be responsible. This does not mean let the card sit in your wallet gathering cobwebs. You must use the card to establish credit. However don't go to Best Buy and purchase half the store, thinking you can forget about your payments. Those due dates exist for a reason, and you'll incur a big penalty if you don't meet them. You'll also make yourself look bad in the eyes of creditors, appearing that you are delinquent and can't take responsibility for your own spending. I have a friend who misbehaved as a freshman nearly six years ago and he still is having trouble getting a credit card today.

> "Shouldn't those who can have a great impact on your financial abilities down the road be people you trust?"

Paying the minimum monthly payment at least will save your reputation, but it won't help with the debt much. As most of these cards have interest rates in the upper teens, those charges alone usually cancel the minimum amount due. I currently carry a balance of about $4000. Yet I put a minimum of $500 towards that each month. While I am still spending, I know that I am at least making some inroads. A point of note for you fans of American Express: the card that has no preset spending limit, also requires the balance paid in full each month. That's not a good idea for those of you who want to get something for nothing in the here and now. The bottom line: if you only pay the minimum due, your grandchildren will be the ones who eventually pay your debt off.

If you're worried that you won't be able to responsibly handle the ability to buy almost anything you want, pick a certain thing to use your credit card for. Gas is a great option. It's something that all of us who drive usually purchase at least once or twice a week. It's also something that universally accepts plastic. Also, unless you drive from Boston to New York on a daily basis, the amount of charges you build up won't be astronomical. I haven't paid cash for gas in over three years, and even earn a little back through reward incentives.

Those incentives are a must. There are too many credit cards out there that offer you something for using the card, that unless a normal card is interest free, which they aren't, I wouldn't even bother. I earn free gasoline on one and airline miles on my other card. There's a reward program of almost everything imaginable out there. While it's true that the prize isn't much, it's still better than nothing.

That shiny piece of plastic in your wallet can be a wondrous thing. It opens doors to many things you might not have the cash for immediately. It also is vital in securing a hotel room, a rental car, or almost anything else that needs a deposit. Just use them with intelligence. Is a t-shirt with a sexual joke really worth mortgaging your future? Hardly.

The death of Marriage

Nick Ames

Like many of you, my parents are separated/divorced and, like many of you, I have suffered from the emotional and physical problems that these drastic separations naturally incur. However, I am not about to drop some sad, heartbreaking story about how terrible divorces are for children, or as my friend Pink laments, how much of a pain it is to have to split the holidays, to have two addresses, or deal with your mom's new boyfriend. No, instead, I would rather pay my last respects to the archaic institution of marriage and in turn, shed light upon a new way to approach life with the opposite sex, for a generation jaded by disintegrating households and parents squabbling like first graders.

In order to comprehend the death of marriage as a formal institution, we must first understand why this institution arose in the first place.

Marriage derives itself almost entirely from humanity's need to procreate and thus create a family. Second to facilitate the upbringing of our young, marriage serves an economic purpose. Marriage engenders a division of labor, not only between husband and wife, but also among their children. This means that it is easier to raise children with someone else than it is by yourself. The last purpose of marriage is to provide stability, be it economic or emotional, for both partners and more importantly their children. Marriage is nothing more than a legal contract to protect the family. Marriage is rewarded by the government with tax breaks and by big corporations with family packages, family tickets, family restaurants, etc. Society rewards marriage with huge drunken celebrations, bad music, and most importantly, approval.

As my teenage angst seeps slowly away and rational thought gradually takes over, I am still left with an abhorrence for this supposedly wonderful institution, which, after all the guests had left, the threshold was crossed, and champagne went flat, robbed me of my last few years of childhood, and turned my parents into depressed relics of their former selves. I believe that the present notion of marriage is fundamentally flawed in that it does not take into account something as basic and primal as human nature and moreover, this flaw can be traced directly to our own early experiences with the opposite sex.

If I am going to criticize marriage as an institution, then I must also criticize the society that slowly and inexorably pushes us towards this supposed bliss. From the first time I can remember noticing girls, and we all know what I mean when I say noticing, the idea of a platonic relationship with a member of the opposite sex went right out the window. Friends of mine who were girls suddenly became sexual objects and sexual tension arose from the slightest glance, remark, or touch. Out of this newfound sexuality arose two possibilities when it came to interacting with the opposite sex, either you became involved in some sort of sexual relationship or you found each other so unattractive that you became friends.

Neither of these possibilities is especially daunting in their early stages, but as a relationship or friendship with a girl or boy progresses, it becomes railroaded towards one objective, to get married. It is only a matter of time before parents start nagging about grandchildren or friends start wondering why the two of you are not together. It becomes impossible in our society for two people of the opposite sex to just "be". Instead they need to "be" engaged or "be" married.

Once the societal pressure to get married is relaxed, we can begin to examine the inherent flaw in marriage itself. The number one reason cited in divorce courts for the ending of a marriage is adultery and therefore, adultery is considered the biggest threat to a successful marriage. To err is to be human and this fact, combined with the societal pressure to get married, creates a recipe for disaster. Our generation is more aware of these pitfalls than any other before it, as baby-boomer parents everywhere split apart and we bask in the latent sexuality of pop culture with its Real Worlds, Joe Millionaires, and Britney's cheating on Justin's.

Our hope lies in our experience and the improvement of communication between the sexes. We've seen the battlefields of divorce and they're not pretty. If a man and woman can agree not to get married, then what is there to dread? Certainly not divorce, for without marriage there can be no divorce, no who gets what, no one hurt.

Our generation will not let itself be fooled by the prospect of marriage. We know it's bogus. I can't wait to retreat to the hills with my "friend-with-benefits," have a few children, save my parents the expense of some shwag ceremony, and take the kids to Disney World. I just hope I get the family discount for the Monorail.

My brother, Ilan

Dan Yagudin

I weep for you, my brother Ilan. I never got to meet you. The thick glass of the TV set always separated between us.

I saw you there, in the press conferences, in the training sessions, smiling, confident, and with that beautiful, precious, Israeli flag on your astronaut uniform. We all watched you Ilan, all of us in Israel. You made us damn proud.

You were more than 20 years older than I, but I feel that we have so much in common. You are the son of an Auschwitz survivor. My grandmother was there, too, Ilan, at Auschwitz, maybe at the same time as your father. On what happened in that place nothing more needs to be said. You knew the legacy and responsibility that the survivors' generation left us with. Maybe it is that legacy that made the Israeli flag on your uniform seem so precious to me. It is the flag of the country that gave our families refuge after the mass murder of the Jews in Europe. It is the place you called home.

> "There are thousands of people alive today because ofwhat you did twenty-two years ago, Ilan."

I weep for you, my brother Ilan.

We were so happy when you blasted off from Florida into space. You were our best and brightest. I wish you could have seen the articles that were written that day in Israel's newspapers – "Ilan, cross the sky and fly like the wind, we are with you." I never heard anyone call you by your proper title, Colonel Ilan Ramon. You were simply Ilan. Our Ilan.

I cannot tell you what kind of a relief your trip gave us from the realities of the Middle East. Between Arafat's suicide bombers, the rifts between the secular and religious in Israel, the inflation, and the crumbling economy, there was you. Anytime you were on television, people cheered. You united us. We were all proud of you, our brightest star.

I weep for you, my brother Ilan.

I wish you could see what the Internet message boards say now. America, as the nation that sponsored you and lost six of its own astronauts in the Columbia disaster, has adopted you as one of its fallen sons. The Americans aren't the only ones – there are people who love you in Australia, in Canada, in Europe, and elsewhere. You and the astronauts that died on Columbia became everyone's heroes. But to us, the Israelis, Ilan, the pain is especially sharp. It is us who walk in the place of your birth, of your life. It is us who must bear your absence.

You knew the risks, there's no question about that. There is also no question that you were willing to take them. You took them for the causes that were dear to you – for science, for humanity, for Israel. This was not the first time you took risks for your country. You were one of the pilots who bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981. You flew over hundreds of miles of enemy territory to destroy Saddam's nuclear weapons program. The world condemned you then, Ilan, but when Saddam launched his missiles at Israel in 1991 with no Israeli provocation, they understood that what you did was right. Saddam probably would have had nuclear weapons by now if it weren't for you. There are thousands of people alive today because of what you did twenty-two years ago, Ilan. How the mighty heroes have fallen.

I weep for you, my brother Ilan.

I weep for you because I saw the interviews with your family, and they miss you. I weep for you because the emails that you sent them before your descent to Earth were supposed to be read by your whole family. I weep for you because I don't believe it was your time to go. I weep for you because God extinguished the little flame that gave the people of Israel and the Jewish people so much pride, and so much hope. I weep for you because this is all I can do. My only condolence is that I am glad that you died at the height of your career, doing what you loved, and in the company of people you loved. You were, and are, my hero, Ilan, and we will continue our lives down here, protecting your beloved Israel.

But we now must do it without you.

Breaking up isn't hard to do

Rockin' Out

Samara Marblestone

Guess what?

I think that I found a current, talented rock band that not only write its own powerful lyrics, but also sends chills down the spines of anyone willing to tune their ears into their amazing music.

Going through a tough break-up? Not only will these guys allow you to rock out to its rage against ex-girlfriends, but they will also, in a weird way, calm you down through their hard rock sound.

I'm raving about Audiovent, which is half-blood related to the band Incubus (no wonder why they're so good!). Lead vocalist Jason Boyd (brother of lead vocalist Brandon Boyd of Incubus), guitarist Benjamin Einziger (brother of guitarist Mike Einziger of Incubus), bassist Paul Fried, and drummer Jamin Wilcox have beautifully and successfully managed to translate its bitter feelings of heart break and relationship break-ups into an immaculate combination of loud and soft rock music that literally blows my mind every single time I tune in.

The boys are natives of Calabasas, Calif., and have been making music together for nearly a decade. Its debut album, "Dirty Sexy Knights in Paris" was quietly released by Atlantic Records on June 4 of last year. There really wasn't much hype on the band until its amazing hit single, "The Energy," was played on select rock radio stations. This song not only perfectly summed up the anger and frustration of being hurt over by a devious female, but it's also an anthem of never, ever letting a woman get the better of you.

Now, let me ask you this. What kind of emotions are the best for creating good music?

Audiovent does a flawless job of proving that emotions of anger, frustration, heartbreak, and regret are the perfect ingredients to an incredible and unforgettable album.

Let's look at No Doubt and Alanis Morrissette for example. No Doubt's breakthrough album, "Tragic Kingdom," was such an amazing success due to lead vocalist's Gwen Stefani's harsh break-up with bassist Tony Kanal. Hit singles such as "I'm Just a Girl" and "Don't Speak" shot No Doubt to the top of the charts — and these were two songs that were directly related to Stefani's broken heart.

Nothing beats Alanis Morrissette's debut album, "Jagged Little Pill," which is obviously the result of Morrissette's several broken relationships that not

'The Hours' strikes one

'The Hours'

Dear Reader,

Before attending the film "The Hours," I was subjected to that terrible attribute, most likely as you were too, which befalls many movies this time of year, called "hype." In the past, when I've seen a movie that is being touted as the "best of the year," or "a remarkable motion picture," I've often come away with below-average feelings for it. In 2000, "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon" was an example where I expected so much from the movie, perhaps unfairly, and my hopes were dashed upon the rocks. I know I was one of the few, but I went into "The Hours" with the same unfortunate feeling in my stomach, that what I was about to see would certainly be, well, something unique, but I wasn't optimistic it would be, as the character Virginia Woolf in the film might be prone to say, my cup of tea.

I was afraid of Virginia Woolf and company going in to see "The Hours;" on the one hand, I figured it'd be a stuffy, British drama, reminiscent of a Merchant-Ivory production, while conversely, I added to it a good amount of "chick-flick" sensibilities. I was right on both accounts, somewhat, but was surprised to find myself inexorably drawn into the story. The Virginia Woolf angle is only one of three in "The Hours." I was pleased to find that the movie also encompasses a storyline from the 1950s, as well as one from present-day New York, comforting me with the addition of storytelling from two eras I can better relate to than Woolf's 19th century way of life.

Nicole Kidman, who plays Woolf, is almost unrecognizable as the writer behind the prosthetic nose, and switch-

'Hours' book and movie ready to take you on a ride to last a lifetime

'The Hours'
By Michael Cunningham
Picador U.S.A.

By SEAN HOLMES

More than 400 years ago, William Shakespeare wrote six words that seemed so simple on the surface, yet said so much and would go on to be one of the most famous phrases in the English language: "To be or not be?" It is questions like this that people have been asking themselves forever as they struggle with the meaning and existence of life. Why continue to live? What does it all mean? Humans have explored these kinds of questions through countless pieces of art over the years and Michael Cunningham's Pulitzer Prize winning novel, "The Hours," is one of the most recent and more profound works.

With all of the attention that the film version is receiving in critical and popular circles, interest in the novel is also being rejuvenated. However, as busy college students with precious little spare time and piles of books and course packets to read, many of us would probably rather spend two hours watching the film then invest the time and energy required for reading the novel. Understandable as that is, anyone who can spare the time would be well advised to read the book for "The Hours," for it is a masterpiece of modern literature.

The Roots make another classic album with 'Phrenology'

The Roots 'Phrenology' MCA

By JUSTIN CHELLMAN
Collegian Correspondent

With three back-to-back classic albums, The Roots have quite a back catalog to live up to. The Roots burst onto the hip-hop scene in the early '90s and gained popularity with the 1994 hip-hop classic "Do You Want More?" Hip-hop had become almost exclusively music held down by a DJ making tracks for emcees. The Roots brought a different style with live instruments. With Brother Question a.k.a. ?uestlove on drums and percussion, Hub on bass, and later Kamal on keyboards, The Roots breathed a fresh blast of air into hip-hop. In the beginning The Roots had two emcees, Black Thought and Malik B, but over the years the troubled Malik B has stopped performing and recording with the band, leaving Black Thought the solo emcee fronting the band.

The Roots also brought the art of human beatbox to the forefront by helping two masters at the art, Rahzel the Godfather of Noise, and Scratch gain notoriety by performing along with the band. Both artists have gone on to record their own solo albums. Since 1994, The Roots have influenced many groups, and many emcees have used live bands to back themselves up, including DMX, Snoop Dogg, Common, Mos Def, OutKast, The Mountain Brothers, and Saul Williams. Their last album, 1999's "Things Fall Apart," won a Grammy and, after having such success and coming off of an accompanying large tour (with Dave Matthews no less), it can be understood that the next album venture would be difficult. On that subject Brother Question was quoted as saying, "There's a challenge after a big record. There's an instinct to try and duplicate it, of if you can't than to abandon your sound. But I feel the challenge is to evolve."

Evolving would be hard when you have a band that fluctuates in roll call. With members leaving the group it would be easy to make the mistake and lose the magic and the connection they had. On "Phrenology" The Roots definitely changed their sound. Whether they evolved or abandoned their sound is unsure. It is most likely somewhere in between. Up front I will say that although it is not a completely disappointing album, "Phrenology" isn't on the classic level of the past Roots releases. It could be the absence of Malik B, (whom I feel is the better of the two emcees lyrically, no disrespect to the talented Black Thought) or it could also be the band's departure from the jazzy sound that made them popular to a soul R&B sound. Whatever it is this album leaves a true Roots fan wanting more, as the album does not feed the need that the last three accomplished.

On the other hand it is not always fair to measure a band's new album by the success of its last albums. "Phrenology" by itself is a very decent album, with some great songs; there's also some average, not horrible songs. The album has its strong points though, such as the Nelly Furtado guest appearance track "Sacrifice" where Thought sings the soft chorus with Nelly and talks about life lessons over Kamal's chimey underwater keyboard effects. "The Seed (2.0)" is a remake of featured artist Cody Chestnut's alternate version with Black Thought adding the lyrical force. Of course Cody steals the spotlight on this track because of his powerful and harmonious voice that is reminiscent of a younger Lenny Kravitz. But perhaps the most important song on the whole album is "Water," in

One of the most overlooked civil rights tragedies of the 20th century occurred in the early half of the century. Phillip Noyce's brilliant, moving "Rabbit-Proof Fence" focuses on the awful, all-too-true story of a misguided and casually racist Australian social reform program designed to eliminate any traces of native Aborigine from the dusty countryside.

In 1931, half-caste children – the progeny of the white folk who abandoned them and aborigine who raised them – were abducted from their native camps by Australian police and lodged, away from their families, in rural school camps, where they would be trained in the art of domestic servitude. The hope was that they would further lay down with men and women of Caucasian biology, so that with every subsequent generation that aboriginal blood would be bled out and only a "pure" race would survive. (Sadly, this was a program that lasted another forty years.)

Among the children captured that year was a 14-year-old named Molly, her little sister Daisy and cousin Gracie. Unwilling to stay at the camp, the girls escaped and made the perilous, 1200-mile journey back home by following a "rabbit-proof" fence – then the world's longest fence – a wire wall designed to keep the wild rabbits from destroying farmland. Using the fence as a guide the girls made the journey home, trying to survive not only the brutal outback landscape, but the trackers following them from the camp. The journey would take more than two months to complete.

This amazing true story was recounted in a book by Molly's

'Maid' gives its 'Two Weeks' notice

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Hugh Hefner stars alongside Sandra Bullock in the respectable "Two Weeks Notice."

Is Jennifer Lopez ashamed of being famous? I've never seen a major star trying so hard to make herself out to be so humble. In her song "Jenny From the Block" she desperately tries to paint herself as the same old girl from the Bronx, and in her new movie "Maid in Manhattan" – which can aptly be described as "Pretty Woman" meets "Working Girl" with a lobotomy – J. Lo plays the totally unglamorous role of a maid at a posh Manhattan motel.

Except Lopez may just be playing the single most glamorous looking maid ever in existence. When her character, Marisa Ventura, leaves the house in the morning for work, she doesn't look like a harried single mother desperately trying to make ends meet. She looks like a model going shopping on her day off. Lopez looks as casually chic in "Manhattan" as she does in her videos, dressed in outfits that have been created by designers to appear to resemble every-woman clothing. I've never seen an actress acting so humble – and being so utterly disingenuous about it.

"Manhattan" itself is a singularly charmless Cinderella story. Marissa is craving a chance to jump from maid to assistant manager while raising a little boy obsessed with the '70s and Richard Nixon. One day, her best friend convinces her to try on a dress owned by a snooty guest and Marissa's caught wearing the dress by Republican senate candidate Chris Marshall (Ralph Fiennes, a long way off from his usual dramatic fare) who mistakes her for a fellow guest.

I've the most myopic movie fan can tell where this is heading.

It only it could have been more fun getting to the destination. "Maid In Manhattan" is a damp, pale romantic comedy in which the comedy is almost non-existent and the romance carries all the beauty of a '80 cent Hallmark card. Romances live and die on the chemistry of their stars, and "Maid In Manhattan" is pretty much buried by the miscasting of the two leads.

Jennifer Lopez stars in another clunker in "Maid in Manhattan."

To say that Lopez and Fiennes don't have chemistry is an understatement; this match-up is less reactive than a water molecule.

Fiennes, in particular, seems uncomfortable with such a limp romantic hero as the one he uneasily embodies. Fiennes, the most glowering leading man in modern cinema, for once cracks a smile and it's a creepier sight than anything he did as the villain in "Red Dragon." His rictus grin looks like it's disguising the murderous thoughts of a homicidal madman; Fiennes looks like he's trying out for the role of Patrick Bateman in an "American Psycho" sequel.

'Two Weeks Notice'
Directed by Mark Lawrence
Starring Sandra Bullock Hugh Grant
Warner Bros
100 mins.

In addition to sporting what may be the year's cornicst movie title, "Maid" features a cast of talented actors (Stanley Tucci, Bob Hoskins, Natascha Richardson) shoehorned into worthless supporting roles. Lopez meanwhile has truly become a megawatt star – she's stopped giving genuine performances (in movies like "Out of Sight") to do the same thing over and over again in garbage like this.

Sandra Bullock and Hugh Grant don't do anything they haven't before in "Two Weeks Notice" but they do it well, and, for the first time, they do it together. Bullock is once again cast as a diamond-in-the-rough, the girl who starts off as a frump or a tomboy, and ends up a glowing beauty. She stars as Lucy Kelson, the liberal lawyer daughter of former activists who takes a job with construction magnate George Wade (Grant) an affable, impulsive cad who hires Lucy on the spot when she tries to stop him from tearing down a community social center. She wants to affect change from within; Wade wanted to hire a pretty girl, but one with smarts on order to appease the business-minded brother sick of Wade's bubble brained trophy conquests.

Like "Maid," "Notice" fails to tread ground that hasn't been treaded before. Unlike "Maid," "Notice" actually tries to make the experience enjoyable. Bullock and Grant have an easy chemistry with each other. Grant [illegible] with his role he is the ex-pos the true star of "Two Weeks Notice." While his George Wade lacks the depth of his role in "About A Boy," Grant turns on the charm without much strain and adds hidden layers to his rich playboy. Bullock is sweet, but less successful at deepening Lucy's character than Grant. Writer/director Marc Lawrence, whose previous vehicles for Bullock as screenwriter have ranged from bad ("Forces of Nature") to middling ("Miss Congeniality"), gives a casual wit to his script. "Notice" walks a familiar path, and, to be honest, it begins to falter the closer it gets to the end but Lawrence engages with some clever jokes and pen most delivered with impeccable style by his stars. If "Maid in Manhattan" is cubic zirconium, then "Two Weeks Notice" is a diamond

'Darkness Falls' so bad it's scary; 'Fantasy' bloody good time

By Johnny Donaldson

Want this monster as your date? Then avoid seeing the disastrously bad "Darkness Falls."

Which is worse: a bad film made badly, or a bad film that's well made? "Darkness Falls," a horror film about a killer tooth fairy (what's next, a deadly unicorn?), nudges me in the direction of the latter. Director Jonathan Liebesman injects as much style and energy into a rather lame compendium of cliches about a vengeful witch wreaking havoc on the small town that executed her centuries before, in the vain hope of convincing audiences that there is something here.

Newcomer Chaney Kley is the prodigal son who returns home to face his intense fear of the dark (see, the spirit killed his mother when he was younger ...) and help the spooky brother (Lee Cornie, whose raccoon eyes recall Haley Joel Osment without the talent) of his once quasi-girlfriend (Emma Caulfield, "Buffy the Vampire Slayer.") Continuity error piles upon continuity error, as scares quickly devolve into merely startling shocks (yes, a yowling cat jumps into frame.) The tooth fairy itself is an eerie creation, with its porcelain doll mask face, but the relentless bad acting and gaping plot holes do more damage to the audience than the murderous banshee does to her victims.

'Darkness Falls'

The scariest thing about "Darkness Falls" is how bad it is.

In the first "Final Destination" a teenager has a clairvoyant vision of a gruesome disaster and saves a handful of people, only to discover that Death doesn't like to be cheated out of its rightful claim. In "Final Destination 2" a teen has a clairvoyant vision of a gruesome disaster and saves a handful of people, only to discover that death doesn't like being cheated out of its rightful claim. Only this time, the accident is a multi-car wreck rather than a plane crash, and the hero is a brunette girl rather than a blond guy.

Yes, "Final Destination 2" repeats the who-will-be-next-to-die gamesmanship of the first, but turns it into a morbidly ironic Grand Guignol comedy of errors. Kimberly (A.J. Cook, "The Virgin Suicides") sets out on a spring break road trip with her friends, when she has a vision of a logging truck losing its stock on the highway. Logs and vehicles careen and smash into each other; carnage showers the asphalt. The accident is almost apocalyptic in its hallucinatory horror. Director David R. Ellis stretches the tension to the breaking point, delaying us the sight of the crash as much as possible while setting up the events – and then he unleashes the violent cataclysm with an unholy fury.

'Final Destination 2'

"Final Destination 2" is the first horror movie in a long while to tap into the communal energy that comes from the act of going to see a horror movie. The audience I attended with shuddered and whooped and hollered as Ellis laid down one queasy trick after another. Like the first one, Kimberly uses her intuitions to save the drivers behind her. Like the first ones, the victims begin to die in graphic freak accidents as death comes to collect his trophies. This time the deaths are even more elaborate and gorey, as various unlucky souls are mashed, minced, diced, impaled, incinerated and destroyed by a wide variety of everyday objects (plate glass and fire escape ladders among them.)

Care for a pole? "Final Destination 2" features a predictable storyline.

When a character stuck his hand into a garbage disposal, you could feel the audience tense and squirm in anticipation of whatever nasty turn Ellis would come up with. The movie isn't exactly scary, and it's not classic cinema. The acting merely hits competent level, plot holes yawn wide and the dialogue at times flirts with being downright atrocious rather than just laughable, but there's a sadistic comedy to the domino effect deaths on display here. The Rube Goldberg complexities Ellis and his screenwriters, J. Mackye Gruber and Eric Bress, dream up to dispatch the pretty young cast are at once improbable, ingenious and charged with the jolt of getting caught up in the ride (a jolt that has disappeared from even the best of modern horror movies.) "Final Destination 2" hardly makes for classic cinema, but as far as the dead teenager genre goes, it generates a bloody good time.

Finn and Miller rock Boston's Avalon

By Lauren DeFilippo
Collegian Correspondent

BOSTON – When the phrase "singer/songwriter," is uttered, it usually garners one of two responses, to varying degrees. The first is nothing short of devotion, usually in the form of, "Ohmigod! They (insert name of act here) rule(s)!" The other response, usually along the lines of, "Who the hell is that?" sounds equivalent to indifference, but is usually the result of difficulty navigating the congested and unruly waters of popular music. The most powerful means for assuaging this difficulty is for each artist to go out and distinguish themselves from their peers. On Feb. 1, The Avalon in Boston hosted one such coming-out party for newcomer Rhett Miller and veteran Neil Finn.

Neil Finn with Rhett Miller

Conveniently located at 15 Landsdowne Street, The Avalon has recently acquired quite a reputation as one of the premier clubs in America. Unfortunately, this notoriety brings with it the need to impose a curfew on its other scheduled events.

The show began at 7 p.m. and was over before 10:30 p.m., giving the promoters ample time to transform the space from rock 'n' roll venue to dance club (i.e. kicking out the entire audience). Neil Finn even commented on similar promoting practices in Australia that he had experienced with his band Crowded House at the height of their popularity in the 1980s. Anecdotes aside, Finn played for nearly two hours, extending his set to the maximum possible length by including two encores.

Rhett Miller, frontman of Dallas rock-country act Old 97's and Finn's opening act, released his first solo album, "The Instigator," in Sept. 2002. For the album, Miller teamed up with veteran producer, Jon Brion, who has worked with artists such as Aimee Mann and Fiona Apple, as well as the Old 97's, playing keyboards on their album "Fight Songs." Miller played a short but energetic acoustic set that was far from boring. He brought a powerful sound that was not only clean, but also solid. The set was a mix of both ballads and pop tunes, comprised of material from his debut, but did include an acoustic rendition of the Old 97's "Barrier Reef." Rhett Miller displayed the amiable personality, boyish good looks, and musical chops to be considered the "next big thing," with radio friendly tracks like "Come Around" and "Our Love."

For those not acquainted with Neil Finn, a quick introduction may be necessary. Finn started his musical career as part of new wave act Split Enz and later went on to front Crowded House. In 1996, Crowded House unofficially disbanded, leaving loyal fans clamoring for Finn to release a solo album. He began his prodigious solo career in 2001, releasing the critically-acclaimed "One Nil" worldwide, but failing to secure distribution in the United States. American fans did, however, notice Finn's Seven Worlds Collide Tour (2001), which featured appearances by Lisa Germano, Ed O'Brien of Radiohead, and Johnny Marr of cult favorite The Smiths, and Pearl Jam frontman Eddie Vedder.

Finn, the seasoned professional, quickly took the stage after Miller's set, with curfew in mind. Wasting no time, Finn and his band began to play. The first song was less then memorable, but was followed by a passionate performance of "Pineapple Head," highlighted by a jazz interlude in which Finn segued effortlessly from rhythm guitar to keyboards and back. The audience responded to this with utter appreciation for their hero. The rest of the set, which broached the two-hour mark, was enjoyable and even included witty cell phone stage banter from Finn himself, making long distance international calls to Lisa Germano and brother Tim Finn on fan's cell phones. The first encore included a cover of "There is A Light That Never Goes Out" which Finn dedicated to the song's co-author Johnny Marr, as well as a rocking version of "Distant Sun." The second encore, which was a command performance for diehard fans, ended the set on a high note with Finn and the crowd joining to sing his biggest hit single to date, "Don't Dream It's Over," a necessary throwback to his Crowded House days. After three hours of thoughtful lyrics and guitar heroics, the Boston faithful of nearly 1,800 were finally appeased and begrudgingly exited The Avalon to make way for a night club crowd.

daughter, Doris Pilkington, and Noyce ably transports the powerful story to film by stepping back and not allowing directorial pyrotechnics to tell the story. Instead he allows the landscapes, the score and the acting to tell the story, which has long been needed to be told.

Kenneth Branagh, appropriately bureaucratic as A.O. Neville, the government's head of the reform, also steps back to allow his young costars to shine. The girls, unprofessional actresses all, are magnetic to watch, in particular Everlyn Sampi as Molly. Sampi's eyes flash with quiet determination and survival, it's impossible to tear yourself away from her. Noyce directs with stark, spare skill. The Australian landscapes are shot with a focus on their horrible beauty, the way that the desert vistas are filled with both natural splendor and hidden, omnipresent danger, and there are times when the camera seems to be looking from the eye view of the young girls. The score, by Peter Gabriel, filled with chants and didgeridoos, has a haunting splendor and complexity. Noyce's astonishing, near perfect embodiment is both sad and hopeful, potent and heart wrenching. As cinema goes, it's nearly miraculous.

"Rabbit" may not be a commerical success, but its a critical smash.

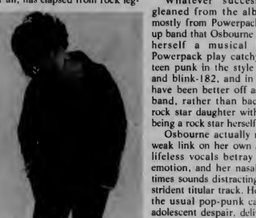
which Black Thought talks about and to Malik B, telling listeners about the rapper's problems and drug addiction. Thought calls for Malik to stop letting life pass him by and come back and to let him help, because together they need to get over "the water."

Unfortunately the next two movements in "Water" add an unneeded six minutes of boring ambient jam sessions that aren't particularly even jams because it is more jumbled sounds that clash together making the listener reach for the "next track" button. This happens on more than one occasion on the album and it leaves me to wonder what The Roots were thinking, they are not Radiohead so I do not understand why they felt compelled to try and put Kid A into their album at various points. Whatever they were trying to do with these jam sessions are lost to me because it definitely doesn't fit in with the radio friendly tracks like "Break You Off" and "The Seed (2.0)."

The Roots manage to cap the album off nicely though, with an excellent song "Pussy Galore" about sex and how it sells everything, making the world go around. Using the euphemism "Pussy Galore" to describe the vices that make people do things, such as greed for money, power, and pussy galore. The track has a very smooth beat laden with soft keys and electronic sounds that back Thought's rhymes well. Then they follow with another dope soft song "Complexity" featuring Jill Scott, and is reminiscent of prior tracks by The Roots, such as "The Hypnotic."



The Roots also grace us with another great hidden track called "Rhymes and Ammo" featuring Talib Kweli. Just as in the last album, the hidden track is definitely a standout and also a straight banger. This track comes hard as they come and is sure to be a concert favorite for getting the crowd into the show on the next Roots tour. It goes on after the song for a dope session from Razel the Godfather of Noise (is he still with The Roots?) as he wows you with his new one-man techno DJ show.

Overall I guess this album was a success rather than a failure, but I would hope to expect more from The Roots in the future. Also for a band who has just added a new guitarist to their ranks, he was almost non-existent, which has me wondering if he is just for show or are they going to actually introduce a new guitar rap sound. Whatever the answer, I'm sure that we haven't heard the last from The Roots, and hopefully we can see Malik B return to the mic and bring back the M-ILLA-TANT that was definitely missing from the album and the shows.

Kelly struggles while following father

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

It was only a matter of time before one of Ozzy Osbourne's kin pursued a musical career of their own. Music legends have always seemed to spawn upstart offspring: Bob Dylan fathered Jakob Dylan, Cher and Gregg Allman created Deadsy's Elijah Blue Allman, John Phillips brought forth Bijou Phillips. Why not Kelly Osbourne, the 17-year-old punkette daughter of the man who led Black Sabbath and the man who plays godfather to today's metal acts by way of the Ozzfest tour?

COURTESY KELLY OSBOURNE'S TEAM (2.3)M

Kelly Osbourne makes a so-so debut album with "Shut Up!"

Parental lineage aside, Kelly Osbourne seemed destined to her own record deal thanks to the insta-celebrity status bestowed on her via her hit reality series on MTV, Today's conglomerated media matrix is one of complete and utter corporatization, a world where synergy, avarice and instant fiscal gratification take precedence over achievement and skill. Her famous for being famous status makes her the perfect person to release an album in a post-Britney Spears era that values image over relevance, Q factor over long-run credibility. Her music may be different from Spears, but her punk-pop leanings are just as trendy and the fact that the record deal coincides with her new fame shows that it's her celebrity appeal that's selling the music; the music isn't selling her.

Kelly Osbourne
"Shut-Up!"
Epic

Critics are of course chomping at the bit to rip her apart. Wasn't her punk-metal remake of Madonna's "Papa Don't Preach" just a little too obvious, a little too phony? Hasn't her family been overexposed enough? Her father after all, has elapsed from rock legend to fond memory releasing sputtering albums met with poor sales and reviews, to playing part in a "comeback" that shows him as a doddering, burnt-out old man. Shouldn't this marble-mouthed relic go away and take his brood with him? And, by the way, how bad was Kelly's album going to be?

Well, not that bad actually.

Not all that good either, but not all that bad. "Shut Up!" isn't the horrible atrocity that other misguided celebrities have released. Osbourne plays "punk rock" in the same vein of Avril Lavigne – she's a little more punk than Lavigne, though she's still far from the orbit of genuine punk.

Whatever success can be gleaned from the album comes mostly from Powerpack, the back up band that Osbourne uses to give herself a musical backbone. Powerpack play catchy sounding teen punk in the style of Sum 41 and blink-182, and in fact would have been better off as an actual band, rather than back-up for a rock star daughter with visions of being a rock star herself.

Osbourne actually may be the weak link on her own album. Her lifeless vocals betray no hint of emotion, and her nasally voice at times sounds distracting, as on the strident titular track. Her lyrics are the usual pop-punk catalogue of adolescent despair, delivered without the wit, sleekness and/or vulnerability that distinguish the better and best of the genre. No musician ever should be allowed to use a lyric as lazy as "blah blah, blah blah, blah blah, blah blah," as Osbourne attempts on "Shut Up!" Then there's some lines that are downright silly, such as this bon mot from "Coolhead": "You got a reputation/ for being a ladies man/ I've got determination/ for thoroughly kicking your ass my friend."

"Shut Up" is silly and inoffensive fluff, only intolerable because of its shallowness as a marketing tool rather than a music album. Osbourne may be here today and gone tomorrow (or she'll wise up, and work on making real music rather than shilling more a conglomerated, but I see big things for Powerpack in the future.

only ended in immense heartbreak, but also intense rage and anger over being used and cheated on. This is definitely proof that negative emotions translate into incredible, breakthrough music.

What's nice about Audiovent's debut album is that it's directed towards the dudes and not the women. Many break-up albums are from a female's point of view and not a man's. Even though I'm a chick, it doesn't mean that I can't understand or appreciate Audiovent's lyrics and music — in fact, it allows me to take a trip into the male psyche and realize that women aren't the only ones who get hurt.

So yeah, maybe rock music isn't so bad, and Audiovent is definitely doing a great job of taking early rock influences of Jimi Hendrix and Led Zeppelin and intense emotions to guide rock in the right direction, for once. Thanks guys.

'Hours' book a speedy page-turner

The story of "The Hours" has been well-documented through all of the film write-ups and trailers: a day in the life of three different women in three different points in time, who are connected in many ways, chiefly through the Virginia Woolf novel "Mrs. Dalloway." Over the course of the story many other connections emerge and the women lament over questions of existence and what their life means. Connecting a novel and three characters spanning three different eras in the context of a cohesive novel is a very original idea, yet is a difficult task. In the hands of a lesser writer it would turn into a haphazard, unfocused mess. Yet Cunningham pulls it off and integrates many important themes and ideas.

The primary focal point of the novel is Virginia Woolf. She is the central character around which the other two women revolve, and as we see her in the novel, she is in first stages of writing her famous novel "Mrs. Dalloway," which will go on to be an inspiration and model of escapism to Laura Brown, a housewife in 1950s Los Angeles.

In present day New York, Clarissa Vaughan is a mirror image of this central character of "Mrs. Dalloway." Many of the themes that run through the novel stem from Woolf's real-life battle with madness and suicide. At its most basic level, "The Hours" reaffirms Virginia Woolf's importance as an artist and shows the urgency of questions she asked about life. It also shows the lasting significance of great works of art in this case, literature.

The first thing a reader will notice about the book is the intricate beauty of the writing. Indeed the entire novel is a display of virtuoso writing with gorgeous, majestic prose and phrases that grab you by the neck and overwhelm you in their stark poignancy. The way the words flow is utterly organic.

Through this masterful prose Cunningham subtly weaves over the course of the novel how there are so many similarities between these women than just the "Mrs. Dalloway" connection. Confined in the monotony of domestic responsibilities they all live a lie – going through the motions with no real substance living for someone else, trying to make rewarding lives for themselves in spite of demands made from friends, family and lovers. They struggle internally with conflicting claims of love, hope and despair and have to confront mental or physical illness, either to themselves or someone they know. They all deal with the social barriers and private emotions of homosexuality (they all kiss another woman). Despite being pressed hard with death, they find solstice in the small beauties of life.

The novel has been criticized for having no plot. It is true that essentially there is little action and dialogue. The three women spend their time musing about life and death within themselves. But the actual plot is not as important as the sweep of emotion that Cunningham is passionately painting with his words, and the sure-handed way in which he does this is perhaps his most impressive achievement. He perceptively brings human emotion to life. He challenges the reader plunging them into the depths of the human consciousness, probing the struggles and fears, the longings and regrets that surge through the mind. He put[illegible]words all of those unnamed thoughts and private emotions that we struggle with and feel all the time and yet are never able to really articulate. The action of the novel, essentially, is not physical but rather emotional, as much is feared, hoped for, lost and sometimes recovered.

Perhaps the only real negative point of the book is the fact that the characters are a little underdeveloped. We identify with the characters. We feel what they feel and we see them grow emotionally, yet there is still a vagueness to each of them that keeps the reader from really getting to close to any of them.

Upon first glance, the novel may not seem too appealing to the average college student. Indeed, some of the novel deals with the process of aging, examining where one stands in life and looking back to younger days. But critics who say that the average reader cannot relate to these characters are mistaken. I found that what much of what these women deal with and face are relevant themes to all people, regardless of any age, sex or race: fear, identity, the confusion of love, trying to live life even when it seems difficult, the prospect of hope for the future.

Essentially what Cunningham has done here is brilliantly examined how we live life and the journey of each of the women is a journey we all take. We see so much possibility, we strive to achieve so much. We get lost in moments where it feels so good to be alive and happiness seemed to be everlasting, and then, suddenly, we turn around and life has put us somewhere we were not expecting and regret surges the mind. We look back on those happy moments and wonder if they will ever return. Yet in spite of sorrow, pain and the promise of death, the simplest of things can be the shining moment and make life seem worth it.

"The Hours" is also a unique case in which reading the book and seeing the film compliment each other wonderfully well to create an experience far more rewarding then doing just one or the other. David Hare, the screenwriter for the film version, does a remarkable job of translating a book predicated on words and interior monologues to an effective and intriguing screenplay, but there are certain aspects of the book which could not be translated quite as effectively.

Those who see and enjoy the film first will find that vague and confusing sections, such as the relationship between Laura and her son, will be explained and understood through a reading of the novel. Likewise those who read the book will find their understanding and vision of the novel greatly enhanced by skillful production and direction, as well as magnificent performances by some of the finest actors and actresses working today (even the over-acting of Ed Harris was arresting in its own way). In fact, I found that the ending to the film version proved to be more conclusive then the book's, which left me asking a couple questions.

Be forewarned — one must have an open mind in order to really appreciate the novel. Much of it is, indeed, depressing and the themes of homosexuality, death and struggling for life tend to make people very uncomfortable while the emotional toll it takes can be potent. Don't read the book unless you are prepared emotionally. But once you are willing to make the journey, "The Hours" will prove to be a rewarding and moving experience that will trickle down your spine and resonate in your soul.

'Hours' movie gives new life to book

[illegible]n Australian transplant to the author's British tongue, Woolf is arguably perhaps one of her most well-known work[illegible] "Mr. Dalloway" when [illegible]n film before. At the same time, we're introduced to Laura Brown (Moore), a [illegible]s housewife on the verge of a nervous breakdown, who is reading Woolf's "Dalloway." Finally, there is Clarissa Vaughn (another performance by the gifted Meryl Streep), a New York book editor who is living the life of Woolf's Dalloway, valiantly trying to throw a party for a dying friend who has just had his book printed. Clearly, the first subject is that of Woolf – depression and coming to an to the second one (the film is about) because of the book "Mrs. Dalloway," and at first the third story-line (that of Vaughn's parallel life to Dalloway) seems to hang in mid-air without much of a connection. We come to find out however, that the character, [illegible]nspired when Vaughn's dying friend Richard, is revealed as the son of Laura Brown, the woman whose story we follow in the 1950s.

The film's basis begins with a book being written and subsequently printed (Woolf's), and concludes with the creation of another novel (the dying Richard's). Part of what made "The Hours" so appealing was not just its skill at telling three similar, yet quite different, stories at once (not to mention that the only noticeable male role in each plot is named Richard), but what grabbed me more so was the powerful effect that literature can have on the lives of more than just its authors. (Ironically, as adapted from a novel, so it must be placed to the fancies of some studio executives?)

Perhaps it was that my novice movie going mind could not fully absorb all the power of "The Hours" in one full swoop. What to make of Woolf's relationship with her sister when she comes to visit? Or, why is Laura Brown so sad? Why does Clarissa Vaughn feel as though she must be so committed to her MDS-stricken friend Richard, when he doesn't appreciate her graciousness? These all too human questions possibly have no answers here, and for once, a movie is showing an honest reality of existence. That could be what makes them take root so deep in our psyche, since we're used to happy endings and understanding everything on the screen. I did not leave "The Hours" with a happy ending feeling. In fact, I was most shaken by the moral I was left with at the end, that being the idea that when happiness stops to exist in your life, it might be time to turn in. However, as was previously mentioned, it could also be the case that I am off course in my search for answers, and such solutions do not exist, taking greater persistence to dig them out.

The cinematography, the editing, or even the mannerisms of each actor on screen: there was more to it than meets the eye, putting my brain on near sensory overload. It's not often a film takes such a firm hold of the mind, and while that doesn't exactly mean it is a positive outcome, there is something special about it, and that should be embraced.

Avs bury Bruins in OT

de Vries beats Shields with seconds remaining

BOSTON (AP) – Greg de Vries scored with 42.3 seconds left in overtime and Patrick Roy stopped 28 shots as the Colorado Avalanche extended their recent dominance of the Boston Bruins with a 3-2 victory Tuesday night.

The Bruins forced overtime when Mike Knuhle scored with 3:21 left in the third period on a pass from Glen Murray.

Bruins	2

Colorado pushed its unbeaten streak to six games, matching its longest of the season. The Avalanche are 6-1-1 in their last eight games against Boston.

Scott Parker's first goal of the season 2:31 into the game gave Colorado a 1-0 lead. Parker, who had missed the last 13 games with a broken left foot, beat Boston goaltender Steve Shields with a one-timer from the slot.

The Avalanche took a 2-0 lead late in the first period when Peter Forsberg's wrist shot from the left circle trickled off Shields' pads and into the net. It was Forsberg's 17th goal of the season.

Boston's first goal came when defenseman Hal Gill's 70-foot shot from just outside the blueline midway through the second period caught Roy off-guard, making it 2-1.

Shields, making his first start since Jan. 20, settled down after the first period and made 18 saves. Boston was 0-for-6 on the power play.

The Avalanche improved to 13-5-4-3 on the road and extended their unbeaten streak away from home to five games.

Notes: Bruins forwards Martin Lapointe and P.J. Axelsson both returned to the lineup. Lapointe had missed the last five games with a groin strain, while Axelsson sat out the last four with a sore back. ... Boston defenseman Rich Brennan missed the game with an ankle bruise. ... Bruins defenseman Sean O'Donnell left in the first period with a sprained knee and did not return. ... Colorado recalled forward Brian Willsie from Hershey of the AHL. Willsie, who was leading Hershey with 21 goals and 40 points, replaces Dan Hinote, who sustained head and leg injuries in a car accident Sunday night. ... The Avalanche are 69-7-15-2 since 1997 when Forsberg scores.

NEW YORK (AP) – Kevin Millar was awaiting word Tuesday on whether the Chunichi Dragons would release him from his agreement to play in Japan this year.

Millar met Monday night with Mitsuo Kodama, Chunichi's manager of baseball operations, who was to speak with higher-level executives when the club's offices in Japan opened Tuesday.

Millar agreed in early January to a $6.2 million, two-year contract with the Dragons, who paid $1.2 million to the Florida Marlins for Millar's rights.

Florida then released Millar, who later changed his mind and decided he didn't want to play in Japan. The Boston Red Sox are hoping to sign him.

SJC to rule on controversial Route 1 parking fee

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) – The Supreme Judicial Court will decide on the legality of a controversial fee charged by the state to parking lot owners along U.S. Route 1 near Gillette Stadium.

As part of the 1999 law that paved the way for the stadium to be built, legislators approved a $5 fee for each of the 8,000 offsite spaces used during games, concerts and other events.

The state waived the fee for the first two years, but it demanded the $400,000 from parking lot owners in 2002. But one vote and are willing to make the journey, "The Hours" will prove to be a rewarding and moving experience that will trickle down your spine and resonate in your soul.

Williams' trial for Feb. 18 called off

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) – Jayson Williams' trial for Feb. 18 was called off Tuesday when an appeals court agreed to consider dismissing manslaughter charges against the former NBA star.

An appellate panel is to hear arguments March 12 in Trenton from his lawyers and the prosecutor's office. The ruling was filed Tuesday, without elaboration, by two appellate judges.

Williams' lawyers, Joseph Hayden Jr. and Billy Martin, said they were pleased the court accepted the appeal. A message to the prosecutor's office was not immediately returned.

Williams' lawyers contend the office's grand jury presentation was flawed and the grand jury never should have been told Williams exercised his right to remain silent after a limousine driver was shot to death at his mansion last Feb. 14.

They also accuse prosecutors of introducing rumors connecting Williams to organized crime while leaving out evidence that he was distraught after the shooting and tried to help the victim.

Ken Caminiti ordered into state-run rehab

By LYNN BREZOSKY
Associated Press

HOUSTON (AP) – Former National League MVP Ken Caminiti was ordered to a state-run drug treatment facility Tuesday, giving him another chance to avoid jail time for cocaine use.

Caminiti tested positive for cocaine use last week, prompting prosecutors to request his probation on a drug conviction be revoked. Texas District Judge William Harmon overruled that request Tuesday on the condition Caminiti enter a tougher program.

"The judge's feeling was that he has been through three or four different private programs," said Caminiti's lawyer, Kent Schaffer. "The judge is feeling that none of them worked.

"A lot of private programs are like very, very nice hotels and they happen to have treatment a couple of hours a day," Schaffer said. "The judge wants to make sure he's someplace where he can concentrate."

Caminiti turned himself over to the court Tuesday and was to stay at the Harris County Jail until arrangements were made at the center in Humble, a suburb northeast of Houston. The program is operated by the state jail system and stays run four-to-six months.

"He recognizes that he's having some problems and he needs this sort of treatment," Schaffer said.

The former third baseman pleaded guilty of cocaine possession last March, four months after police found him and two other men with drugs and drug paraphernalia in a Houston motel.

He entered a three-year community supervision agreement, meaning the conviction would not be on his record if he met the terms of the deal. As part of the terms, Caminiti was ordered to receive counseling three times a week, speak to students about drugs, continue attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and submit to periodic urinalysis.

A longtime member of the Houston Astros, Caminiti was the NL MVP in 1996 with the San Diego Padres, hitting 40 homers and driving in 130 runs. He returned to the Astros in 1999, before winding up his major league career with the Texas and Atlanta in 2001.

Last summer, he was quoted in Sports Illustrated as saying half of major league baseball players use steroids and that he used performance-enhancing drugs during his MVP year. Caminiti later said he was aware of only a few players taking performance-enhancing drugs.

Minutemen head to Tenn. for rare February non-conference contest opponent away from the Mullins Center.

Good thing the Maroon and White got a taste of road success, because the crowd it will face tonight at Thompson-Boling Arena will be as rowdy as any it has seen this year. This added advantage has paid off for the Volunteers, who have posted an 8-2 record at home this season. Tennessee possesses a 2-4 mark on the road.

The Volunteers, who start two forwards and three guards, are led by senior forward Ron Slay, who averages 21.2 points and 7.6 rebounds per game. His sophomore frontcourt mate is Brandon Crump, who is good for 10.4 ppg and 6.1 rpg.

Freshman point guard C.J. Watson has impressed as well. The Las Vegas, Nev. native averages 9.7 points, 4.8 rebounds and 5.2 assists.

The Minutemen will counter with forward Jackie Rogers – their only starting senior – who averages 15.3 ppg and 5.4 rpg. Junior point guard Anthony Anderson is the only other UMass player in double figures, with 10.2 per game to go along with 3.3 rebounds and 4.0 assists.

Although heating Tennessee would be a big deal for UMass as a program, Lappas and Co. are more worried about the conference slate right now.

With Saturday's matchup against Temple (6-12, 4-4 A-10) on ESPN looming, the Tennessee game isn't even the most important for the week for the Minutemen.

"If I had to take just one, I'd take the Temple game," Lappas said on his Monday radio show on the UMass Radio Network.

Some good news for Lappas, freshman Mike Lasme, who left the Fordham game after reinjuring his right ankle, will be able to play for the Minutemen tonight.

The Abidjan, Ivory Coast native originally injured the ankle in the preseason and hurt it again on Jan. 15 against Rhode Island.

Lasme, who starts at shooting guard for the Minutemen, is averaging 8.3 ppg this season.

Tired of the Dorms?

Seattle's Gary Payton will take part in the 989 Sports Skills Challenge during the NBA's All-Star Weekend. The event tests contestants' dribbling, shooting and passing ability.

NBA All-Star Weekend approaches

Adam Levoy

This weekend marks the official midpoint of the NBA season known as the All-Star break. This is the weekend where mediocre and very good players have some time-off for themselves, while the stars of the league can showcase their skills for the rest of the world to "ohh" and "ahh" at.

This All-Star weekend will be slightly different than past years.

First and foremost, if you are looking for the game on NBC, you won't find it. The game will make its debut on TNT marking the first time the All-Star Game is televised on cable.

Festivities kick off Saturday night at 4 p.m. with traditional events such as the Rookies vs. Sophomores game, 3-Point Shootout and Dunk contest.

This year the league has added a new event for Saturday night. The 989 Sports Skills Challenge will feature four of the leagues' top point guards – Gary Payton, Jason Kidd, Tony Parker, and Stephon Marbury. The event will be a timed obstacle course, which utilizes the skills of the point-guards, such as dribbling, passing, and shooting.

The actual All-Star Game tips off Sunday at 8 p.m. This year the players will be wearing throwback jerseys from the 1988 All-Star Game. If you are not sure which ones those are, they are the old-school jerseys with the big stars downs the side. It is ironic that the league chose to bring back some tradition in this day-in-age, especially when things have changed so much – it is no longer referred to as All-Star Weekend, but the AOL All-Star Game.

Times certainly have changed for our generation. Not too long ago, the All-Star game was a spectacle that you would go out of your way to catch on prime time NBC. Fans were lucky enough to see Michael Jordan, (A Jordan in his prime that is – not this impostor who wears number 23 for the Wizards) vs. Clyde Drexler, Patrick Ewing vs. Hakeem Olajuwon, and Charles Barkley vs. Karl Malone.

Except for Jordan, these greats have either retired or are no longer at an All-Star level. Other past greats sitting at home this weekend include Reggie Miller, Malone and David Robinson.

The game has turned into a popularity contest; case in point: Vince Carter is starting for the Eastern squad. Carter has introduced the world to the term "Vinsanity," however having him even play in the game makes me experience "insanity." Carter has missed 33 games this season, and has done absolutely nothing to deserve a spot on the All-Star team. The only reason he is playing this year is because his name is Vince Carter, and fans have a good memory of what he has done in past seasons.

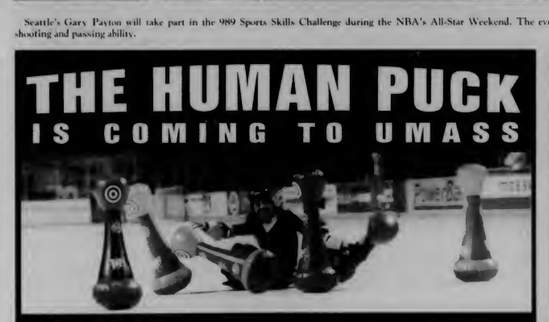
Maybe the most shocking story surrounding the game is who is starting over whom. The phenomenon known as Yao Ming is starting over Shaquille O'Neal for the Western squad. Yao is good, maybe will be even great in years to come, but let's get off the Yao Ming bandwagon for just a minute. Yao is the future, but Shaq is the present and, most importantly, in his prime. He hasn't won three straight rings by being just big.

Shaq should be starting, end of story. Shaq is head and shoulders the most doninant force in the league and it is a disgrace he is not starting as center for the West. Shame on you fans who voted!

How about the Michael Jordan issue? This goes against my theory that an appearance should be based on numbers and merit, not name, but if ever there was an exception, Jordan is that exception. Jordan is lucky he is even playing Sunday, for he is no more than a good player in the league anymore. He can still be "classic" Mike every now and then, but numbers-wise he is no longer an All-Star.

This is where the NBA fans should have stepped in. How Jordan is not starting his last All-Star game is unbelievable. It was hard enough to see Mike come off the bench at the start of the season, but to see him come off the bench in the All-Star Game is a crime. He simply did not receive enough votes from the fans. I guess he truly has fallen out of the eye of the average fan. Apparently it is no longer the Michael Jordan love fest but the Yao Ming extravaganza.

Commissioner David Stern needs to find different criteria for the selection of the reserves in the All-Star Game. The rosters should not be picked by need of certain positions anymore. The game means nothing, so why not make it as close to a pickup game at The Rucker as it can be?



Would the average basketball fan rather see Brad Miller and Zydrunas Ilgauskus play in the game simply because they are centers and the roster needed to fill two players for the center slot, or see the likes of Baron Davis, Latrell Sprewell, and Mike Bibby? I for one much rather see a Sprewell dunk or a Bibby behind-the-back pass than Brad Miller putting back a rebound or Ilgauskus shooting a short jumper.

I'll watch the game this weekend and maybe have a pizza and beer to go with it.

Actually, Sunday night is the "Simpsons" and "Malcolm In the Middle," so screw the All-Star Game. I'm watching FOX.

shot or his feet since ninth grade. He'll do anything to win. When a shot goes up, his posterior will jack hammer someone's torso.

"That's called boxin' out [expletive deleted]." And don't leave him open either. So what if his form looks like a water painting in a rainstorm? He'll take it to the hole strong for two. Some people tell him he takes the game too seriously. You know what he tells them? "That bruise will heal eventually."

Central: A quasi-hippie-slash-rock star who can flat out shoot the ball. His entrance will sometimes draw snickers from the loitering ballers around him. His lanky frame would better suit Greg Louganis, and his hairstyle is tuned to MTV.

But this baller owns the element of surprise. Other teams will usually throw the weak link on him. By then it's too late. He doesn't say much. He lacks an on court charisma by nature. He'll just weave by you like a worm through Swiss cheese. And he's got one of the jump shots that you couldn't block with a two-by-four. But that's what you get for laughing at him.

Central has probably been ridiculed his whole life by mindless jocks and he's decided to retort by panking you in front of your peers. Just a piece of advice: next time you see the kid that looks athletically inferior to Bobby Fisher, be somewhere else.

Servusso: It's too bad because he's such a nice kid. You just know he was the last pick in every elementary gym class. He'll show up for basketball game in jeans and an alligator shirt. He's Paul Pfeiffer. He was the easy target in dodgeball, the kid who couldn't climb the rope, the swirly victim.

But God help him, he loves the game. "I suck. I suck," he'll say after a free throw thunders off the backboard. The kid's intense. So what if his dribble drive lacks one essential piece: the ball? So what if the staunchest shot blocker he'll face is the bottom of the backboard? So what if he's got the shooting touch of a rhinoceros? He plays anyway. When he trips over his own feet on a fast break, he gets up and keeps going.

If he was on a college basketball team, he'd be the walk-on that everybody chants for. But there's no crowd in this gym, no one yelling for him to hurl a three. But when he accepts a hard chest pass with his abdomen before lofting a lame duck through the nylon, a satisfactory grin claims his teammates.

Wannabe: Our villain. A legend in his own mind. He walks into the gym like Bond, tossing his sweats aside like a top hat and counting.

"1,2,3,4..." he says, pointing to each player on the floor. People look at him like he's Scooby-Doo at the Westminster Dog Show, but this kid's sure he's the nastiest player in the gym. Five minutes and he's already calling for a sub. Next time down the court he's calling for the ball.

"I'm open," he says from half court. First, he tries a spin move that ends with two points...for the other team. So he goes to his bread and butter move. The old behind the back, rejected by the rim combo.

"Damn, that one usually works," he says. Next trip a brash defender dishes some smack. "Yo man you got teammates." The Wannabe offers his man a blank stare, before he launches a fadeaway jumper that couldn't find the rim with Mapquest.

Lions hire Mariucci

By LARRY LAGE
Associated Press

DETROIT (AP) – Cast aside by the San Francisco 49ers, Steve Mariucci found his services in strong demand back in his home state.

Mariucci was hired as coach of the Detroit Lions Tuesday, taking over one of the league's worst teams less than three weeks after he was fired by the 49ers.

"We are thrilled," Lions chief executive Matt Millen said. "This is a huge step for our team and organization," Lions chief executive Matt Millen said. "I have known Steve since he got into the NFL as an assistant, and he has continually impressed me with his knowledge of the game and his ability to handle players and people."

Terms were not disclosed, but ESPN.com reported that Mariucci will earn $25 million over five years, which would make him one of the NFL's highest-paid coaches.

Mariucci, born and raised in northwest Michigan town of Iron Mountain, was scheduled to be formally introduced at a news conference Wednesday.

After compiling a record of 60-43 and guiding the 49ers to four playoff appearances in six seasons, Mariucci becomes the Lions' fourth coach in four seasons. He replaces Marty Mornhinweg, who was fired last week after the Lions went 3-13 and 5-27 in two seasons – the worst two-year mark in team history.

Mariucci clashed with San Francisco owner John York, and he was fired three days after a 31-6 loss at Tampa Bay on Jan. 12. His postseason record was 3-4.

The Lions, by contrast, have one playoff victory since winning the NFL title in 1957.

"I think it'll be good. Good for him, because he will be in a situation where he's actually wanted and appreciated," Lions defensive end Robert Porcher said Tuesday. "I think it'll be good from a team standpoint, because now our general manager gets the guy that he's always wanted.

"And I think from the players' standpoint, it'll be excellent, because he brings in that instant credibility with his winning record in San Francisco."

Mariucci repeatedly said he wanted to keep his family in the San Francisco Bay area, and he would be willing to take a minimal raise or even coach the final year of his contract without an extension.

Mariucci's agent, Gary O'Hagan, has said that Mariucci's ties to Michigan played a part in his interest in the Lions after he initially said he would take next year off from coaching.

Mariucci will be about 90 miles away from best friend, Tom Izzo, Michigan State's basketball coach. Mariucci and Izzo grew up together, attended Northern Michigan and talk almost daily.

"It's going to be great, really it is," Izzo said while traveling to see a recruit Tuesday night. "I'm pumped up for him, and I'm pumped up for the Lions and all their fans."

Mariucci had been Detroit's leading candidate since the Lions fired Mornhinweg. Mariucci was the only coach to have an in-person interview, last Wednesday and Thursday.

Millen never publicly named any other candidate but said the Lions would do their best to comply with the NFL's policy of interviewing at least one minority candidate.

O'Hagan, who also represents former Minnesota coach Dennis Green, refused comment on numerous reports that Green refused to interview with the Lions because they appeared to have their sights set only on Mariucci.

A source within the league, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said five minority candidates turned down interview requests from the Lions because it appeared inevitable that Mariucci would be hired.

Attorney Cyrus Mehri, who along with attorney Johnnie Cochran led a campaign for more minority hiring in the NFL, was disappointed with Detroit's hiring process.

"By essentially crowning Mariucci as the next head coach before doing a single interview, the Lions discouraged African-American coaches from putting their hat in the ring in Detroit," Mehri said Tuesday. "Millen, in public and private statements, could not look African-American candidates in the eye and tell them they had a fair shot. I don't blame the coaches who didn't want to be a part of a sham interview.

"We're competing for the soul of the NFL, which has been based on a good old boys' network, not fair competition for jobs. The ball is in the league's court now. If they condone this, they have ripped the heart out of the 'Rooney Plan,' because what Matt Millen has done harkens back to the good old boys' days."

The NFL's new policy, announced in late December, said owners agreed they would "seriously" interview at least one minority candidate for each coaching vacancy. The policy was developed by a committee headed by Pittsburgh owner Dan Rooney, following a report on minority hiring issued by a group headed by Mehri.

"The Lions' selection process fell short of what our committee recommends for all clubs as agreed in December," Rooney said in a statement Tuesday. "I will discuss this with the committee and the Lions to see what occurred and where to proceed in the future."

A basketball tragedy

Matthew F. Sacco

Setting: Totman gymnasium rests in the northeast corner of the University of Massachusetts. It is January in New England. A bitter cold and snow ushers players into the rickety building. Warmth is the welcome mat as you enter and a hybrid scent of sweat and overheated radiators greet you as well.

The building is decidedly drab and drenched in earth tones. The tile floor is barely visible under the dust accumulated from generations of players. The gym itself has few adornments. A few empty water bottles litter the sidelines near a dented metal folding chair. There are two courts, side by side, with an unspecified material acting as the floor.

Its charm is an acquired taste for basketball played in shadows. One half of the gym is not lit, encouraging a prayer with each jump shot. A motley group of players are gathered on the lit end, using a foul shooting contest to choose

Cast of Characters

Baller: A person who knows how to play the game of basketball. He's wearing a pair of throwback college basketball shorts and an AAU tank top. He's not much of a talker, until he gets on the court. He'll let you know when he releases leather for a one-way trip to splash.

"What's that in your eye? Looks like a 'J,'" he waxes to one unlucky mark. But he respects the game. When he catches himself hanging on one play, he purposely avoids the ball and a cowardly deuce. He grew up with the game. The hoop gods are watching, he dare not shame them. That's why he plays hard. Losing sucks for the Baller.

But winning isn't the only goal. He must entertain as well. He's a walking And-1 commercial, especially when toying with the fell-O-ankled ballers of Totman. He brings the playground indoors for the winter.

Hack: He's a round mound of rebound, but devoid of skill. He'd wear shoulder pads if it was legal but he settles for a game face to accompany the Wizard mesh shorts and tee.

He likes losing as much as the fluoride treatment. That's why he wants to guard the other team's best man. He wants to give him a little love bump into the baseline wall, just to let him know he's there. He wants to graffiti the kids arms with blotches of red hack.

It doesn't matter that he hasn't seen his jump

Volunteer work ahead

Junior Anthony Anderson and the Minutemen travel south to take on the SEC's Tennessee Volunteers tonight.

SEC's Tennessee up next for UM

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

This is a different kind of conference.

No matter what you think of the Atlantic 10 in its current state, whether you consider it a major or a mid-major men's basketball conference or not, it simply isn't in the same league as the Southeastern Conference.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (8-12, 2-6 Atlantic 10) will get a first-hand look at the SEC tonight in Knoxville, Tenn. when it hits the court opposite the University of Tennessee (11-6, 4-3 SEC).

One of the best conferences in the country, the SEC boasts five teams in the Associated Press' Top 25 poll – Florida (No. 1), Kentucky (No. 6), George (No. 17), Alabama (No. 23) and Mississippi State (No. 24) and another (Ole Miss.) receiving votes. Out of every conference, the SEC boasts the most teams (seven) in the RPI's top 40.

Tennessee itself is ranked No. 46 in RPI – UMass comes in at No. 188 – and sits in fourth place of the SEC East Division behind Florida, Kentucky and Georgia. The SEC can legitimately case for seven or eight of its teams to get into the NCAA Tournament and whichever ones don't will be considered the favorite to win the NIT.

In the A-10, meanwhile, only Xavier is ranked (No. 20), while St. Joseph's and Dayton are receiving votes. Those three teams can expect bids into the NCAAs, with all likelihood, but the A-10 will probably be limited to just those three teams in the tourney, unless another team wins the conference championship.

The Minutemen are taking a break from the A-10, against which they have played seven straight games, for a rare February out-of-conference matchup.

The last time the Minutemen played an out-of-conference opponent in February came at the Mullins Center on Feb. 5, 2000, when they lost to No. 16 Texas 68-57 on ABC.

"It is a tough time to play a non-conference game, but if you are going to play a good [out-of-conference] schedule, you have to spread it out," said UMass coach Steve Lappas, whose team has played the likes of Indiana, Utah, Boston College, Connecticut and North Carolina State this season.

The Minutemen have won two of their last three games, with wins over Fordham and George Washington – UMass's first win over a Division I

LeBron James asks for forgiveness

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

AKRON, Ohio (AP) – LeBron James wants to play, and he's asking a judge to put him back on the court.

James' attorney requested a temporary restraining order Tuesday to block a ruling by state officials that barred the high school superstar for the rest of the season.

The lawyer for the 6-foot-8 senior, who's expected to be the No. 1 pick in this year's NBA draft, said the player did nothing wrong when he accepted two free sports jerseys from a Cleveland clothing store.

"All LeBron did was receive a gift from a friend as congratulations for his academic achievements," attorney Fred Nance said in a 32-page document filed in Summit County Common Pleas Court. "Had LeBron wished to capitalize on his fame, the recompense could be in the millions of dollars."

Judge James Williams set a hearing for Wednesday morning. Nance said James, who has since returned the jerseys to the store, will not attend.

James was declared ineligible – and his team was forced to forfeit a win – on Friday by Commissioner Clair Muscaro of the Ohio High School Athletic Association for accepting the jerseys worth a combined $845. The OHSAA found that the store gave James the Gale Sayers and Wes Unseld "throwback" jerseys for free, in exchange for posing for pictures to be displayed on its walls.

Muscaro ruled that James broke an amateur bylaw "by capitalizing on athletic fame by receiving money or gifts of monetary value."

The decision came four days after the OHSAA cleared James of any wrongdoing for accepting a $50,000 Hummer H2 sport utility vehicle as an 18th birthday gift from his mother.

Nance said in the court filing that James returned the jerseys when he learned that the gift was controversial and might threaten his amateur status.

James sat out the first game of his career Sunday, and he seems eager to rejoin his teammates. Wearing a gray T-shirt and blue shorts, James attended practice on Tuesday in the school's gym. He warmed up with his teammates and was stretching when coach Dru Joyce III ordered the practice.

Joyce then ordered green cloth banners to hung over the glass doors, so no one could see inside.

Joyce refused to comment on James' situa-

St. Vincent-St. Mary, ranked No. 1 in the USA Today rankings, next plays Miles Prime Time Shootout in Trenton, N.J., this weekend. Because of James' popularity, the school has played in games around the country this season.

The Fighting Irish have four games left before the state playoffs.

If Williams blocks the agency's ruling, James would be cleared to play pending an appeal to the OHSAA.

James also is expected to appeal his suspension to the athletic association. If he makes that decision, he must appeal in writing. The appeal would be heard by a seven-member board of control – not including Muscaro – on Feb. 13 in Columbus.

OHSAA spokesman Bob Goldring said the appeal could be heard earlier if the panel decided to have an emergency meeting.

Nance accused the OHSAA of being frustrated that the school is capitalizing on James' fame by playing in a larger arena, receiving fees from playing in tournaments across the country and contracting with a cable network to televise the games.

Steven Craig, a lawyer for the OHSAA, said, "The commissioner is obligated to interpret and enforce the bylaws as written. That is what he feels he's done in this case and stands by his decision."

The school defended James and said the punishment was too severe.

"LeBron made a mistake and accepts responsibility," James Burdon, chairman of the school's board of trustees, said Tuesday. "He's apologized for the pain he's caused others. However, he has not committed a crime, nor has he consciously hurt anyone."

Burdon said he's confident Williams will issue the restraining order.

The school was initially named a defendant by Nance, but Burdon, an Akron attorney, said St. Vincent-St. Mary will be dropped from the lawsuit.

Nance also asked the judge to reinstate the Jan. 25 win over Richfiel the school had to forfeit.

The filing said that because the jerseys involved personal conduct in which athletics were not involved, only the school – not the OHSAA – had the authority to determine whether James had broken the amateur bylaws.

Muscaro also did not discuss the case with James or the school before finding James ineligible, the filing said.

On Tuesday, James said in an exclusive interview with former NFL star Deion Sanders on CBS News' "The Early Show" that he was sorry he took the jerseys.

"If I had known I was violating anything, I would've never done it," James said. "I would've never jeopardized my eligibility. I would've never jeopardized my team."

Ski teams rule at Loon

Gibson carries men with pair of wins

By Ari Jankelowitz
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts ski team is having immense success this year, and the meet at the Brown Carnival showed how good the team can be under pressure. The men's team is currently in second place, and the women's team is in first place, both in the MacConnel Conference in the Eastern Division.

Coming into the weekend races at Loon Mountain, though, both teams would have to battle the weather as well as their opponents. But both teams prevailed, with the men coming up first in the Giant Slalom and second in the Slalom. The women, not to be outdone, finished first in the Slalom and second in the Giant Slalom.

The meet rules were altered, and were set up in the style of the regional competition. Instead of the top five skiers counting for the men, only three counted. The women's format, with the top three skiers recognized, remained the same.

For the men, Beau Gibson put on a show, finishing first in both events, and winning the Slalom by almost one second. The three men who counted for the team were the same for both events. Following Gibson in the Slalom was Nick Kulkarni at ninth and David Pomeroy at 14th. In the G.S Gibson was accompanied by Pomeroy at sixth, and Kulkarni, this time finishing at 12th.

Gibson continued his Eastern Division dominance with his third win this weekend, and his fifth top-10 finish in six races. Strong skiing by Kulkarni and Pomeroy helped the Minutemen to the top.

The women maintained their overall conference lead by finishing first in the Slalom and second in the Giant Slalom. UMass's Carolyn Lewenberg finished in the top three in each event, the only Minutewoman to do so. Lewenberg finished fourth overall in both events.

The best finish for the women was second, by Nikki Smith in the G.S. Rounding out the Giant Slalom qualifying three, was Lewenberg at fourth and Lisbet Ruuh at 20th. The leading racers for the Slalom were Caitlin Doughty at third, Lewenberg at fourth, and Mollie Lyon at 11th.

Coach Igor Vanovac said that his team worked hard to overcome the challenging conditions.

"The course was difficult with high winds and bitter cold, but the motivation to win overcame these difficulties," he said. "The hard work at practice and the dedication to the ski team is beginning to show, especially in a race like this. Even though the athletes are back in school, the tough practices are still on, and the goals remain high."

Both squads have just three meets left and all could be key to a championship. If both young teams can continue on their current rampage through the mountains, then a United States Collegiate Skiing Association Championship is well in grasp.

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

The UMass ski teams have been off to tremendous starts, and continued with numerous placings in races at Loon Mountain this weekend.

Brooks named dry dorm

By Bridget Henry
Collegian Staff

Housing Services is implementing plans to convert Brooks Hall into an alcohol-free community in the fall.

The decision to make Brooks an alcohol-free residence hall, or "dry dorm," stems from a report made by the Prevention of Alcohol Abuse Task Force in 2001. The report had five recommendations for fighting alcohol abuse on campus, including an evaluation of the way students enforce the underage drinking of other students and the establishment of a substance free dorm.

Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert announced plans to convert an existing dorm into a dry dorm in December, but said that Housing Services was still reviewing possible locations.

Students living in Brooks this semester were notified that their building would be converted to a dry dorm in a letter from Assistant Director of Housing Services David Vaillancourt, dated Jan. 27. According to the letter, Housing Services considered a number of factors in selecting Brooks as a dry dorm, including size of hall, current locations of academic and lifestyle communities and anticipated demand based on wellness floors.

There are currently four wellness floors on campus, located in Cashin, in the Sylvan Residential area, Field, in Orchard Hill, and Gorman and Greenough in Central. Brooks Dormitory, which is also located in Central, has a 24-hour quiet floor but no wellness options.

The four floors designated as wellness floors will remain as such next fall in addition to the Brooks dry dorm. Nevertheless, Vallancourt does not believe there will be a problem with finding enough students interested to fill both the dry dorm and the existing wellness floors.

"There is a difference between wellness floor programs and what housing has anticipated for the Brooks building," he said. "In addition to being substance free, wellness floors have a focus on holistic living."

Residents who wish to live in Brooks this fall will sign a pact in which they agree not to use or possess alcohol or any other mood-altering substances.

Students living in Brooks right now have mixed opinions about the upcoming change.

"I live on the quiet floor, so I don't like people who are noisy. I think making this building a dry dorm is a really good idea," said Brooks resident Mao-Ying Tien, a junior accounting major.

Other students seem less affected by the change.

"I might stay because I figure it's an opportunity to get a room I want in the building," sophomore English major Kevin Sheridan said. "I don't hear many people talking about it though. People forget, they have other things to worry about."

"I think it sucks for the people who want to keep living here," said Chris Vecchia, a freshman theatre major. "If people want to drink in their own room they should be able to."

Vecchia said that he would be living elsewhere next semester.

Vaillancourt doesn't see a problem with the displacement of current students in Brooks.

"Every year communities on campus have displaced students," he said. "They receive a letter from housing, submit their preferences to my office and my department sees their top choices. The important thing to remember is that living in Brooks will be a choice for the students [in the dorm next year]."

He stated that students moving out of Brooks would receive priority placement in the upcoming Fall 2003 room selection process in the letter to current Brooks residents.

Chancellor on the run

John Lombardi sees good things for UMass

DANIEL SCHOFIELD/COLLEGIAN

Chancellor John V. Lombardi is the center of attention this week as the events involving the inauguration unfold. Lombardi says that he sees events like this week's as fitting in times of transition to celebrate what the University has accomplished.

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

The coffee cup says it all.

As Chancellor John V. Lombardi's inauguration week unfolds, he finds himself being pulled in all directions. With all of the hype surrounding the Gala Ball, the Academic Symposia and the Friday morning inauguration ceremony itself, there's little time to be had.

Nevertheless, it would be hard to find a hint of negativity in the man. He's quick to deflect whatever praise is coming his way to someone else, anyone else.

"Yeah, it takes a little time," Lombardi said with a smirk, in regards to the amount of hours he's put in this week. "But other people are working a lot harder than me. Our staff has just been terrific, the alumni have been wonderful [and] the faculty has engaged in producing these symposia.

"A lot of people spent a lot of time. I probably didn't spend the most time. I'm like the TV talent," he said.

"I don't think I have any successes," he said. "All the successes are those of the faculty and the staff and the students, the University. My job is to take credit for what they do."

One more form of praise successfully deflected.

The motto

The cup he holds displays the motto Lombardi has brought with him to the University of Massachusetts: "Money Matters, Performance Counts, Time is the Enemy."

At times, Lombardi has preached all three of the mantras since his introduction to the University over the summer, with the results generally heading in a positive direction.

"I'm feeling pretty good about the place," he said. "When I came people told me we had a lot of problems. What I found is that we have a lot of talent and success and that the problems are being handled and kind of disappearing in one way or the other."

Lombardi enters his office in a rush, 20 minutes late from an interview with a campus TV station. He's wearing a full suit, but is decked out with a maroon UMass parka on top of his sportcoat. Somehow, with Lombardi, it seems neither surprising nor out of place.

"The way I keep score is to make sure we're making progress as an institution," he said. "If you look around at what the faculty has been doing and the students have been doing in terms of making this place run the way it should, it's really been a spectacular semester."

Lombardi said that he's been really impressed with what the University has been able to do in spite of the budget cut crisis and retirements.

"Our biggest difficulty is to figure out how we're going to continue this kind of high performance in the future," he said.

UMass in the forefront

As he gets tugged in all directions this week to grant public appearances and interview requests, Lombardi knows that it's helping get UMass back on the map. That's something he's striving for.

"It's where the University belongs," he said, on UMass being on the front page of papers across the state this week thanks to events surrounding his inauguration.

Nevertheless, he understands that the events scheduled over the next two days here are not the kind you can have all the time.

"Not only are they a huge effort for everybody, but if you do them too often, they don't have much impact," he said. "They're celebratory in transition moments and moments in which we can celebrate what we've accomplished and get us to the next stage. You do these once every quite a few years."

Lombardi sees the events as the first act of the campaign for the new fundraising foundation that he has developed. If the attention has to be on him, he's trying to find a way for it to make money for the University.

"We just finalized it this week. The foundation's principle function is to be a place for the volunteers to get the focus to create a coherent location where we can talk about the policies and the objectives and the drive of our fundraising foundation," he said. "We think it's going to be very successful. It's already beginning to have the impact we want."

Remembering the students

Lombardi believes that if student morale has come up since his arrival, it's only because the University has begun to focus on what students feel their needs are.

"What students want to know when they come to an institution is that the institution is focused on their need to get a first-class education," he said.

"Students are real smart. They know we have problems. They're not confused that there are financial difficulties. What they want to know is that the institution is making adjustments and paying attention to the core mission of educating students."

Lombardi said he believes students have an important perspective in how business is done at UMass.

Right now, that includes several

Greeks meet with SGA

Concerns made known at meeting

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate convened last night with standing room only and the largest Greek presence in nearly two years.

Members of the University of Massachusetts Greek community attended last night's meeting in hopes of opening up communication between the SGA and the Greek community.

Inter Fraternity Council (IFC) President Carl Iannacci and Panhellenic Council President Kristen Laviano addressed the Senate, expressing their intentions to be more involved within the SGA.

"We're not hear to bombard the SGA, we just want to introduce ourselves and extend any help that we can give so that we can work better to communicate with one another," Iannacci said. "Our organization is made up of over 500 people and hopefully we can get more involved in what is going on."

Members of the SGA responded that they felt this was a great start for getting the Greek community back within the SGA.

"I'm glad that the Greek community turned out today," President Dave Carr said. "We work for you and don't let anyone tell you different."

"There has been talk of not allowing second-semester freshman to move into fraternity and sorority housing," Carr said. "We don't want this as much as you do, and we look forward to working with you on this issue."

"I think it was great having the Greeks present," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "It really shows that differences of the past are in the past and that we can move on and work together."

The controversial vetoed motion presented at last week's meeting was once again on the Senate agenda last night.

The redrafted motion concerning the Campus Activities Policies and Procedures handbook and their definition of the timing of when planned events must be submitted was withdrawn from the agenda for a second time.

Questions arose over a second proposed motion that questioned the credibility of the SGA Executive Cabinet's winter term payroll. The motion requested that all executive members requesting payroll must turn in a work log to Brian Thompson, Chair of the Ways and Means Committee, in order to be compensated for their winter session work.

"Accountability needs to be held. I sent out a memo to each member requesting work logs for their hours this winter," Thompson said. "I did not receive them on time and we gave out a lot of hours. Basically, it comes down to that we want to know where our money is going and we want to know what to allocate for the summer for payroll."

Saunders said that it is right for the Senate to know where their money is being spent.

"I'm glad to see that senators are concerned with where money is being spent and I am 100 percent confident that each person who is on payroll is accountable," Saunders said. "In order for us to hold others accountable we must be accountable ourselves."

After further discussion the Senate passed the motion.

The next SGA Senate meeting will be held next Wednesday at 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 174. All meetings are open to the public.

Powell urges U.N. to move on Iraq

By Edith M. Lederer and Dafna Li
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – Secretary of State Colin Powell, relying on a stream of U.S. intelligence, urged the U.N. Security Council yesterday to move against Saddam Hussein because Iraq has failed to disarm, harbors terrorists and hides behind a "web of lies."

His extraordinary presentation in the packed council chamber included satellite photographs, intercepted conversations between senior Iraqi officers and statements from informants that could make or break support for going to war with Iraq.

Russia, France, China and other council members skeptical of the need for a military confrontation said they would review the evidence and demand answers from Baghdad. Most said weapons inspections should continue, Iraq must immediately cooperate and diplomatic efforts should be sought to avert war.

France and Germany went further, calling for strengthening the inspections regime that was already toughened up in November under a Security Council resolution crafted by Washington and adopted by a unanimous council.

Three months after Iraq pledged that it would disarm, Powell presented his evidence to a high-level audience of foreign ministers and ambassadors in an appearance that was televised live to an anxious world.

"The gravity of this moment is matched by the gravity of the threat that Iraq's weapons of mass destruction pose to the world," Powell said. "This body places itself in danger of irrelevance if it allows Iraq to continue to defy its will."

While Powell spoke, Iraqi TV carried a day-old interview with Saddam.

Iraqi officials dismissed Powell's case as a collection of "stunts" and "special effects" that relied on "unknown sources" and was aimed at undermining the work of the inspectors.

"What we heard today was for the general public and mainly the uninformed, in order to influence their opinion and to commit aggression on Iraq," said Lt. Gen. Amir al-Saadi, an adviser to Saddam. Al-Saadi, who spoke in Baghdad, was personally vilified in Powell's speech for deceiving inspectors.

Addressing the Security Council after all 15 members spoke, Iraqi Ambassador Mohammed al-Douri dismissed Powell's charges that his country is hiding banned weapons and has links to terrorists.

Powell's presentation was part of a diplomatic offensive that intensified with President Bush's State of the Union address last week. The administration's next move is to determine whether council members are willing to support a new U.N. resolution specifically authorizing force against Iraq.

Bush has said that the United States – with or without its allies – will forcibly disarm Iraq if it does not immediately comply with U.N. resolutions. But winning U.N. approval would mean the United States could share the costs of war and rebuilding Iraq and would be operating with the support of the international community.

A senior White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the next 24 to 36 hours will be critical as Powell gauges reaction. The key is France, one administration official said. If President Jacques Chirac insists on vetoing such a resolution, Bush won't seek one.

For many at the United Nations, a visit to Baghdad this weekend by the chief weapons inspectors, followed by their next reports to the council on Feb. 14, will be critical for any decision on war.

Britain, America's closest ally, prefers a second resolution but would join forces with the United States against Saddam without one. British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Powell made a "most powerful" case Wednesday. Saddam is "gambling that we will lose our nerve rather than enforce our will," Straw said.

In an 80-minute presentation, Powell claimed that Saddam has had a relationship with al-Qaida dating back to the mid-1990s and that Osama bin Laden has an operative in Iraq who sits atop a "sinister nexus" of terror. He didn't provide any evidence of the relationship, however.

Saddam, in an interview broadcast Tuesday in London, forcefully denied that his government has weapons of mass destruction or a relationship with al-Qaida.

In his presentation, Powell asserted that Iraq bulldozed land around a chemical complex in 2002 in order "to conceal chemical weapons evidence" and has hidden mobile biological weapons labs on at least 18 flatbed trucks.

Hans Blix, the chief U.N. weapons inspector said Tuesday that he hadn't found any evidence of mobile labs.

Powell played audio tapes of what he described as intercepted phone conversations between Iraqi military officers. One was a purported discussion about hiding vehicles from weapons inspectors. Another dealt with removing a reference to nerve agents from written instructions.

U.S. officials said any evidence revealed yesterday which could have helped inspectors had already been turned over to them.

FBI: Al-Qaida top concern

By CURT ANDERSON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Al-Qaida is weakened and scattered but remains the top threat to commit terrorist attacks in the United States, the FBI said in a first-of-its-kind national assessment for Congress.

The study also says there are other Muslim extremist groups engaged in a "jihad," or holy war, against the United States and other Western countries. Some of them provide "varying degrees of support" to al-Qaida, according to the report, which a government official described Wednesday on condition of anonymity.

The FBI assessment comes amid heightened concern about potential terrorist attacks timed to coincide with the Hajj, the annual pilgrimage Muslims make to Mecca. The three-day holy period begins Sunday.

Recent intelligence, coupled with the Muslim holy days, could lead to an increase in the nation's terrorism alert system, according to U.S. government officials speaking on condition of anonymity. It now stands at yellow, or elevated, which is the middle tier in a five-color system.

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the Homeland Security Department, said the threat level is evaluated daily and there are no immediate plans to raise the threat level.

"We remain concerned about the continued al-Qaida activity overseas as well as al-Qaida sympathizers here in the United States," he said. "Should additional information and analysis develop requiring the threat level to be raised, we will keep the American public informed as always."

The government official declined to discuss whether the FBI assessment describes a greater danger of terrorism if the United States goes to war with Iraq. But German Interior Minister Otto Schily, his country's top counterterrorism official, told reporters Wednesday that such a war would inflame Muslim extremists worldwide and increase the terror threat.

"If a war takes place, the emotions will intensify," said Schily, who met this week with Attorney General John Ashcroft and Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge. "It's a matter of concern. You can't exclude repercussions."

The FBI assessment, most of which is classified, will be delivered to members of the House and Senate intelligence committees next week by FBI Director Robert Mueller. Originally promised in 2000, a version was completed just a day before the Sept. 11 terror attacks and has since been rewritten amid criticism from Capitol Hill for the delay.

The central conclusion is that "al-Qaida led by Osama bin Laden remains, for the foreseeable future, the most serious threat against the United States."

The report cites various U.S. intelligence sources as evidence that al-Qaida operatives around the world continue to discuss large-scale strikes against the United States. Al-Qaida continues to be actively attempting to acquire chemical, biological, radiological and even nuclear weapons, the report adds.

Even though al-Qaida has been driven from its refuge in Afghanistan, the report says the organization remains viable. It cites the October nightclub bombing in Bali, Indonesia, that killed nearly 200 and November attacks on a resort and airliner in Kenya as evidence the network is still capable of inflicting great destruction.

Lombardi sees good things undertakings. Studies are being done simultaneously on how to put a bar into the Bluewall and remodel recreational gymnasiums on campus. A billiard hall is being put into the Student Union.

"We're in the process of trying to solve this recreation problem," Lombardi said.

The bar in particular is a complicated undertaking for the University and Lombardi knows it.

"The issue of putting in a facility of that kind is that if you do that kind of facility and you don't do it right, you won't do it again for 25 years," he said.

"We have to make sure have the right security, we have to make sure we have the right kind of space, we have to make sure we have the right kind of everything so that it runs in a first-class fashion," he said. "If it doesn't that's the end for that kind of facility here."

It's what he wants, though.

"Most universities find a way to do this," he said. "They have activity, they have life, they have a band, they have stuff, they have comedy night. There's commotion. That's what we want commotion. I want commotion.

"I don't want to walk into the Campus Center on a Friday night and not see anybody," he said. "I want to see people moving, shaking. I want noise."

Somehow, that doesn't seem surprising either. Whatever it takes to put UMass back on the map.

Government needs to heed cries for more discussion

Secretary of State Colin Powell, addressing the United Nations Security Council yesterday, outlined his case for the war against Iraq, citing "irrefutable and undeniable" evidence that they have not complied with particular demands.

"Iraq has now placed itself in danger of serious consequences," Powell said, pointing to Iraqi defiance in refusing to comply with demands that require them to disarm and present satellite photos, tape recordings and documented testimony from informants.

In particular, Powell noted:

- That in 2002, Iraq "bulldozed and graded to conceal chemical weapons evidence" at the Al Musayyib chemical complex, and had a series of cargo vehicles and a decontamination vehicle moving around at the site.

- The existence of an audiotape containing an alleged discussion between Iraqi military officers regarding the concealment of prohibited vehicles.

Powell's address comes on the heels of a statement made by Hans Blix, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, who said the war clock was at "five minutes to midnight."

Spinning additional, abstract concepts including the "web of lies," Powell represented one of only two members in the 15-count committee – Britain included – that is actively pursuing military action against Saddam Hussein. Despite Britain's alliance with the United States, coupled with the "irrefutable" evidence against Iraq, an overwhelming majority is still emphasizing reason over immediate action and concrete evidence over particularly dangerous assumptions.

German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer said, in part, "We must continue to seek a peaceful solution to the crisis." Tang Jiaxuan, China's foreign minister, echoed the sentiment. "As long as there is still the slightest hope for political settlement, we should exert our utmost effort to achieve that."

Those voices, the calls for discussion rather than destruction, the motions that we should settle politically rather than violently, are also the ones of reason. If war is inevitable, let's exhaust our other options before settling on it. In theory, it's a just idea that the Bush administration wouldn't ever allow for: they've pushed too far already with current initiatives and rely too heavily on past grievances. Internally, it seems, and sadly, Bush and his peers are ruling out other options entirely.

Powell concluded by saying that we must not shrink away from whatever is ahead of us. The posturing beforehand, however, qualified that "whatever" with a serious and very real inference of war. "We must not fail in our duty and our responsibility to the citizens," he said. That duty includes truth and disclosure, a responsibility to all people he seemed uninterested in delivering.

Ethics don't get you 'Layed'

Mark Ostroff

It's a good thing the President had gone on television last fall to finally do for Corporate America what was needed: He gave a speech. Speeches fix everything, right?

As Americans, it seems that we are now on the cutting edge of politics: "When the going gets tough, the tough get in front of a camera and talk about getting going."

It's been a little over six months since Bush interrupted his vacation to put on an economic forum for "ordinary Americans." Apparently Bush has about as jaded a view as to what an ordinary American is as Jerry Falwell has on Teletubbies.

Nevertheless, after Bush's crooning for "higher standards of ethics," it still leaves at least one columnist (guess) completely skeptical. What exactly is Bush's "standard" anyway? In order to understand what ethics means to the Bush Administration, let's look back on a little company called Enron and its former Chairman "Kenny Boy" Lay.

In May 2001, the state of California found itself in the pandemonium of rolling blackouts and fiscal upheaval. The state had spent roughly $8 billion just to keep things up and running, while Enron was happy to be of service.

Recent documents had been uncovered, describing Enron's role in the California Energy Crisis. They include e-mails to Dick Cheney, recommending that the Department of Energy not mention the crisis in its annual report. Even better, under codenames like "Death Star" and "Get Shorty," Enron had put on paper some of its biggest blueprints for a statewide rip-off.

In the midst of the crisis, although the White House couldn't find time to meet with California officials, Cheney had managed to squeeze Ken Lay into his tight schedule to discuss deregulation on the California energy market. At the height of the crisis, deregulated electricity in parts of the state had gone from the typical $30 per megawatt-hour to $1,500 per megawatt-hour. After the money was split, Enron reinvested the money into...well, expensive artwork actually.

"Bush's grasp on business ethics is about as easy to swallow as a pretzel for him."

A month later, while Osama bin Laden was busy handing out flight itineraries, the Bush Administration had more pressing issues of National Security to tend to – mainly debt collection for its friends at Enron.

With the help of bedroom-executive Rebecca Mark, Enron had closed an electricity deal that invested $900 million in India, a country with half of its capitol's residents already stealing electricity.

It didn't matter though. Enron's accounting methods allowed them to immediately report the deal's projected revenues ahead of time. When the deal fell through, Lay called some of his pals in D.C. for help.

The Bush Administration had made the issue "one of the highest priorities" of the National Security Council and had issued threats to cut India off from aid and assistance. While the administration was handling the problem, September 11 came and went...so much for National Security.

But wait, there's more.

At the favor of Enron officials, in exchange for generous campaign contributions (about $1.4 million) by Ken Lay and Enron, Bush had appointed Harvey Pitt as head of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Pitt, originally a lobbyist for accounting firms, advocated for law provisions that allowed for conflicts of interest when firms like Arthur Andersen audit clients like Enron. Actually, it was this same conflict of interest that helped implode Enron and put thousands of people out on the street with no pensions.

One year after Ken Lay had cashed out $188 million in Enron stock, Bush called for higher standards in ethics, proclaiming that he felt "strongly about this." It's funny to see him talk like this when his administration played a key role in the Enron game.

In reality, Bush's grasp on business ethics is about as easy to swallow as a pretzel for him. If deregulating energy to nauseating prices, using America's security resources as a corporate loan shark and outright conflicts of interests are somehow ethical, then Corporate America has a long way to go.

Students take notice:

War is closer to us than we think

Peter Trovato

The 439th Airlift Wing, out of Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee, MA, transports missiles over the UMass campus regularly. The unit operates C-5 Galaxy transports – the largest cargo planes in the Air Force. Almost a football field in length, C-5's can carry over 80 tons of cargo for 5,000 miles without refueling. The jet engines wake local residents from their nighttime slumber and UMass students often look to the sky as the impressive C-5's hover past the Southwest towers. As of late, activity at Westover has picked up. More planes are flying over our heads. A war is about to begin.

Meanwhile, "Joe Millionaire" is heating up. "The Bachelorette" is getting interesting. College basketball is recording various upsets. Phish has a new album out. Al Pacino's latest blockbuster is playing at Cinemark. The SHRE system is giving both students and administrators headaches. And the UMass hockey team is receiving attention in national polls. But the C-5's are still flying out of Westover.

"Our country is about to go to war, but where are the student voices?"

President Bush is rallying for the country to support him in a war effort against Iraq. If the war commences, Bush has stated that he will activate 265,000 military reserves. On Jan. 19, 60,000 reserves were counted on active duty. Merely ten days later, 95,000 were counted on active duty with plenty more to come.

This is real. The current situation is more authentic than any reality television show that can be thought up. Our country is about to go to war, but where are the student voices? Vast majorities are inside their dorm rooms catching up on the latest "Real World" and "Road Rules" challenge. However, right outside their windows, the C-5 planes from Westover transport Patriot Missile systems and tanks to be set up in the Middle East.

President Bush wants to get rid of Saddam Hussein and is growing impatient with the United Nations weapons inspectors. He has garnered support from eight European leaders for using military force against Iraq. But not everyone is offering support to the President. Germany and France are reluctant to lend a hand in any military attack against Iraq, and last week, Nelson Mandela accused Bush of wanting a holocaust.

Three weeks ago, thousands of demonstrators were in Washington protesting the war efforts. One day of activity will not suffice. These protests need to be extended to university campuses. The voices of college students must be heard. It was activism on college campuses throughout the Vietnam War that eventually brought it to an end. Our voices are essential, but they seem to be quiet as of late. Somehow they must be resurrected.

It is time for students to take notice about the situation at hand. It is more serious than the other distractions that fill our day. There are other events taking place – significant, life-altering events. Recently, Fairfax county school systems in Washington D.C. approved emergency plans in case of a chemical attack on the area. Drills could start as early as next fall. President Bush's chief of staff stated on public television that the U.S. would not rule out the use of nuclear weapons against Iraq.

As students, wartime events may seem far away and many believe our actions can do little to affect the outcome. But the past has proven us wrong. Four students died on the Kent State campus in 1970, simply to prove that their voices must be heard. And now, the situation with Iraq calls for the support of students who disagree with the recent movement towards war. It calls for students to look past the common distractions that flood the college lifestyle and take an interest in what is happening in our nation. It may seem far away and impossible to change, but it is closer than we think.

The C-5 planes that fly over our campus mainly transport supplies to be set up in the Middle East. These large planes can transport helicopters, tanks and missiles. However, the planes are used to transport armies as well. The C-5's can transport combat ready soldiers to any location in the world. These planes are located 15 miles from our campus and they fly over our heads all the time. Sooner or later, those planes could be full of soldiers. Next time you hear the jet engines of the C-5, look up and take notice. It is not a drill. Our country is preparing for war. It is the biggest reality we face. It is the impending threat of war and as students we must take an interest.

Media needs to prioritize stories

To the Editor:

Saturday, February 1, 2003, a space shuttle upon reentry exploded over Texas before reaching its final destination.

And unfortunately, that is the extent of my knowledge on this breaking issue.

I can't tell you the name of the shuttle, or who was on it. I can't tell you the reason for their journey to the depths of space, or what happened on the way home. I don't know what the experts have to say, or what the public's reaction is.

Am I cold hearted? Am I ignorant? Am I un-American?

No, I could hardly classify myself as any of the previous. I am just simply afraid to turn on the television.

9/11 changed the world and changed the media forever. Now, I'm no communications expert and I can't hold my own against a journalist, but I truly believe that media has never been the same. It seemed like only yesterday I let myself get absorbed in front of the television for hours, hanging on every so-called "expert's" speculation and opinion. We all did. And we all watched the same footage over and over and over until our eyes grew dry with despair. I swear that every news station must have had a thesaurus on hand, because they managed to rehash the same slew of information from dawn until dusk, each time making it seem like something new had occurred.

I can't do that again. I can't let myself dwell in a puddle of depression on those blue couches sitting in my common room. Call me selfish, but I had a life to lead today. Things needed to be done, and someone had to do them; and that someone could not sit glued to her television.

And it's not just this issue either: Iraq, the Taliban and North Korea; it's all the same. News stations rebroadcast the same footage, interview the same people, make the same speculations and walk aimlessly in the same overly dramatic circles. Everything is a tragedy of some sort these days. In an attempt to drag in viewers and hike ratings, people are being dulled to what is going on around them. People cannot give up their lives to park themselves in front of a glowing box waiting for someone to give them satisfaction that everything is going to be all right.

So dare I say that the media has a need to prioritize? I suppose everything in life has a level of importance or a pressing need. If there is nothing to report on the issues of North Korea, is there a need to devote 30 minutes of syndicated information? This is what news stations have become, syndicated television. Turn to any station, and you'll hear the same words, just different people. Sometimes, the reruns go for days, weeks even.

All I can conclude is that I am afraid to turn on the television.

Remembering Jessica more positively

To the Editor:

Last Tuesday, two very horrible events occurred. The first, the funeral of a deeply beloved friend, Jessica Harpin, and the second was the article published that same horrendous day.

The article, "Cocaine Suspected in Death" by Dan Lamothe was a very disrespectful and distasteful article because of the headline with the picture directly next to it. Maybe cocaine was suspected in the death, but why couldn't that fact been mentioned in small print? The headline should have read, "Deeply Beloved Student Remembered," because if you ever had the opportunity to meet Jess, you would know how special she was. She lit up the room with her huge smile and bubbling laugh. That is the way she should be remembered. The article itself does portray Jessica's charismatic personality and how much she will be missed, but why does the headline have to be such a negative statement?

So many students glance at The Collegian as they wait for class to start, eat lunch or see old papers littering the floors. So, for those people who never had the opportunity to befriend Jess, the headline presents just a bad impression of a girl so admired, respected and loved. Her sudden departure has left many saddened over the loss of such an intelligent, beautiful and truly wonderful person. Now that statement should be in bolded headline print.

N.E.R.D.

10. N.E.R.D. – While little is known about the trio's album, due in the summer, it's safe to say that the second album from N.E.R.D. (Pharrel Williams and Chad Hugo of the ubiquitous Neptunes plus rapper Shay) will continue to merge rock and rap and rely on electro-powered grooves to concoct some of the hookiest tunes out there.

Linkin Park

9. Linkin Park – Tentatively titled "Meteora," Linkin Park hope the follow-up to its eight-million-selling debut, "Hybrid Theory," will launch the Southern California sextet right back into the music stratosphere. Due March 25, the album produced and mixed by Don Gilmore and Andy Wallace, who also worked on "Hybrid Theory," will continue to merge the genres of rock and hip-hop.

OutKast

8. OutKast — The hyperkinetic supersonic duo OutKast return with its fourth album, following the critically and commercially successful "Stankonia." Due in May, "Speakerbox/Love Hater," will be released as a two-CD set, with one disc leaning toward manic rhymes and R&B beats, the other a concept album about relationships that will tie into a movie Dre plans to star in of the same name.

Lisa Marie Presley

7. Lisa Marie Presley — Lisa Marie Presley: credible artist or making good on her father's name?

We'll find out soon enough as the offspring of Elvis Presley releases her debut album, "To Whom It May Concern" April 8. The pop-rock album, four years in the making, may shed some light on Lisa Marie's private life which she has closely guarded, even through high-profile marriages and divorces with Michael Jackson, Nicolas Cage and Danny Keough (who helped produce the album). Other producers include Eric Rosse (Tori Amos), Andrew Slater (Macy Gray, The Wallflowers), Glenn Ballard (Dave Matthews Band), and former Smashing Pumpkins frontman and Zwan leader Billy Corgan. The album will have eleven tracks, mostly written by Lisa Marie.

Limp Bizkit

6. Limp Bizkit – Tentatively titled "Less Is More," Limp Bizkit's fourth album is nearly complete according to the band's website. The album, due April 1, is expected to include songs called "Build a Bridge" and "Crack Pipe," the latter having been tapped as the lead single.

Several musicians have joined Bizkit in the studio including Ministry's Al Jourgensen, Korn's Brian "Head" Welch, Helmet's Page Hamilton and Weezer's Rivers Cuomo. Rick Rubin is producing the project, which may include covers, though the Neptunes have also contributed material.

Beyoncé Knowles

5. Beyoncé Knowles – While albums from bandmates Michelle Williams and Kelly Rowland and sister Solange floundered, Destiny's Child frontwoman Beyoncé Knowles has the greatest chance of hitting it big. The independent woman, who's own single "Work It Out" off the "Austin Powers In Goldmember" (in which she also starred) soundtrack failed to take off, is hoping she'll be able to work it with Missy Elliott and the Neptunes on "Dangerously in Love," due April 1. The star has also been interviewing unknown producers in hopes of introducing a fresh, new sound.

Kelly Clarkson & Justin Guarini

4. Kelly Clarkson and Justin Guarini – After the huge success of Fox's "American Idol," winner Kelly Clarkson and runner-up Justin Guarini are set to release albums capitalizing on their overnight success. Signed to 19 Recordings Limited, the label run by "American Idol's" Simon Fuller (not to be confused with testy judge Simon Cowell), the discs will be distributed by RCA Records in the states. Clarkson and Guarini are currently in Miami shooting "From Justin to Kelly: The Rise of Two American Idols." The big-screen movie, like the albums, is scheduled for release in the spring.

Alicia Keys

3. Alicia Keys –Following her critically and commercially beloved, five-time Grammy winning "Songs in a Minor," R&B chanteuse Alicia Keys will try to beat the sophomore slump with a new album due before Sept. 30 (in time for Grammy eligibility). Although details are scarce, the classically trained pianist has said she will use the many influences she encountered last year while on a world tour, hoping that she'll be able to prevent herself from fallin' off the pop scene.

Madonna

2. Madonna – The queen of pop returns with her follow-up to 2000's "Music," in which she will reunite with electronic über-producer Mirwais. Due in April and tentatively titled "Hollywood" (which will also serve as the title of the second single), the album will have 11 tracks, including at least one where Madonna even raps. Madonna, who is currently sporting black hair, will shoot the video to the lead single, "American Life," this week. The song will likely hit radio by the end of the month.

Britney Spears

1. Britney Spears – Not a girl, but finally a woman. Taking a few months off to rejuvenate, Spears will return with an as-yet-untitled album scheduled for an October release. The follow-up to 2001's "Britney," the record will determine whether Spears has staying power, making it her most important album to date. Reports have linked the star with producers Daft Punk, William Orbit (Madonna), Guy Chambers (Kylie Minogue) and Shep Soloman (Westlife). The buxom blonde, who is experimenting with a rock sound, is also in the studio with Limp Bizkit's Fred Durst, with whom she has been romantically linked to. The project will also reunite Spears with Rodney Jerkins and the Neptunes, who helped produce Spears' last album.

Comedic winter flicks have plenty of laughs

Expect battles with pigeons, bee swatting and abounding ugly sweaters

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

'Just Married'- There's a funny bit in "Just Married" in which Ashton Kutcher, as an American newlywed honeymooning in Europe, gets into an antic slapstick battle with pigeons in St. Mark's Square, and another in which he comes face-to-face with an extremely large, extremely ugly cockroach. The rest of the time, the movie is one of those dumbed-into-the-gutter farces in which every joke has been pumped up to overkill level. Kutcher's Tom, a lowly graveshift radio announcer, marries Brittany Murphy's posh rich girl and the two jet off to the Alps where everything that can go wrong does. The movie begins on a high note as Murphy and Kutcher inflict mutual abuse on each other as they make their way through an airport terminal. Here, the movie looks as if it's about to turn into a Gen-Y variation on "The War of the Roses." From there, "Just Married" flashes back in time to show how a young marriage could have turned into a mess, and the movie dissolves from there. It turns into a crude sitcom farce, hammering itself through nonsensical plot contortions on its way to a happy ending. Kutcher and Murphy have so little chemistry that it's impossible to believe these two young people could have gotten together. Murphy, meanwhile, is forced to play a cellophane-thin straight woman. Individually, Kutcher and Murphy are charming performers. It would have been nice to see them wed to better material.

'National Security'- There's a funny – and daring – bit at the beginning of "National Security," in which Steve Zahn's patrolman is videotaped mercilessly beating Martin Lawrence's police academy reject – except he was actually swatting at a bee for the phobic Lawrence. Any promise of a politically raucous comedy are dashed when you realize that this is going to be one of those films in which a sassy black man is paired up with a taciturn white guy to take down a large crime ring (this time it involves dirty cops, beer kegs made of space-age alloy and a bottle blonde Eric Roberts.) This may be the perfect vehicle for an actor like Lawrence, who has played the same role in far too many films ("National Security" brings to mind Lawrence's own "Blue Streak" along with a dozen other similar pairings). The movie eventually turns into a series of race-baiting jokes.

'A Guy Thing'- Just what we needed so soon after "Just Married" – more dumb piffle about young marriage. Still, "A Guy Thing" is a couple of notches above that film in the interest department, thanks to a supporting cast that underplays even the most idiotic jokes. Jason Lee, a talented actor forced to bland out his acerbic nice guy persona and wear a series of truly ugly sweaters, plays a groom-to-be who wakes up the day after his bachelor party next to one of the tiki girls (Julia Stiles)...who also happens to be his fiancée's (Selma Blair) cousin. That's pretty much all there is to the main plot, with Lee having to endure some of the laziest comic set pieces in a while. Stiles charms (as usual), and she and Lee have more chemistry than Ashton Kutcher and Brittany Murphy did. Then there is the invaluable support of Thomas Lennon, the great Larry Miller, James Brolin and others. They try mightily to elevate this limp trifle, and they almost (almost) succeed.

think this is a Jerry Bruckheimer production, though the chemistry between the leads elevates the movie a few welcome notches. Not surprisingly, this stilted comedy comes from the same guys who wrote "I Spy."

Microwave misfortune

First in series of disastrous events involving microwaves

Micrology

Jessica Pelletier

No matter how skillful, even the most accomplished cook has brushes with disaster, which result in physical pain, take-out or both. The following are factual stories centering on the use of microwave equipment. Maybe horror stories such as these have happened to you; maybe they haven't. Either way, cheap entertainment off the suffering of others is what makes media such as "America's Funniest Home Videos" possible. And if they can do it, why can't we?

DANCES WITH CHEF BOYARDEE – Once upon a time, a young teen wanted a quick, nutritionally void, single serving of ravioli. After a quick two minutes in the nuke-box, the foolish youth reached for the unnecessarily scalding plastic container and promptly spilled the boiling contents over her hand. Ok, whatever, this story happened to me, so I'm gonna drop the narrative and give you the lowdown. The tomato sauce spilled all over my hand, causing me to freak out, jump back, whirl around and lean against the dishwasher in support. I'm sure the entire scene was even better for my brother, who got to watch me perform this jumping dance to the side of the kitchen that didn't have a source of running water. Moral of the story: if you watch the food cooking, best assume it's gonna be hot and use oven mitts to fish it out.

CHILDREN OF THE POPCORN – This story concerns wattage and how it can mean the difference between buttery, crunchy bits of popped corn and charred chunks. Mike Kulak had a hankering for some movie munchies and placed the bag in his full sized Panasonic for the recommended three minutes. Less than two minutes later, friend Mike walked back into his kitchen nook under the pretence that his plans for hot snack food were underway. Unfortunately a hideous odor had drifted throughout the room and the bag had quit its popping. The bag itself had melded with the glass turntable of the microwave, and its contents lay exposed like a freshly gutted fish. Moral of the story: keep a close eye on what you're cooking because many full-sized home microwaves contain wattage high enough to melt the smile off a Barbie doll faster than you can say "Hi Ken!"

On a semi-unrelated note, the aforementioned friend has supplied a perfectly wonderful recipe for hot cocoa, which remains unchallenged. Begin microwaving eight ounces of water in a 12 ounce mug on high for one minute, add cocoa mix and whole milk, microwave again for two minutes and enjoy Mike's steamy goodness.

OPPOSITES REACT – Nothing angers a microwave more greatly than the presence of metal in its chamber. It's a widely known fact that you simply can't place metal pans in a microwave without the presence of enormous blue sparks. Eight years ago, my younger sister decided to prepare a bag of noodles and sauce for lunch in a restaurant kitchen. Having little more than metal cookware to prepare her meal, she dumped the contents of the bag into a holding pan with some milk and butter and turned the beast on for five minutes. No sooner had the machine started than the largest blue-white sparks erupted from the pan. (Honest to goodness, I was there. Although I wouldn't recommend it; it does look wicked cool).

Unfortunately, the microwave couldn't handle the extreme circumstances, and it blew itself out in under a minute. Moral of the story: science is fun; food science is funnier; and unintentional food science experiments are the funniest of them all.

Nuclear holocaust comes to Mt. Holyoke

By CAMERON J. WOODS
Collegian Staff

The Mount Holyoke College Department of Theater Arts will perform the second of Edward Bond's three part "War Plays:" "The Tin Can People." The story unfolds 17 years after a nuclear holocaust and takes a very revealing look at the basis of the human spirit. When a stranger comes into a tiny community of survivors, character is tested and people are forced to face their own fears.

"After Sept. 11 happened, my bosses asked me to choose a musical for the next production, but I said 'No,'" Director Joyce Devlin said. "This one just seemed to have a very tragic timeliness."

Devlin further explained the amount of work the entire production company put in the play.

"For three weeks we put in 12 and a half hour days, doing research on nuclear war, building sets, making costumes and rehearsing," she said.

There will be more than just a night of theater in store for those who go to see this performance. Students involved with the theater department have organized both local anti and pro war groups to set up booths outside the theater. Also following the play, a Mt. Holyoke faculty member will direct public discussions between the audience and the company.

"The Tin Can People" will open on Thursday, Feb. 13 at 8 p.m. There will be repeat performances on the 14th and 15th at 8 p.m. and afternoon showings on the 15th and 16th at 2 p.m. Tickets are $5 for general admission, $3 for students and seniors and are on sale at the MHC box office at (413) 538-2406.

'The Tin Can People,' which explores themes centering around the human spirit, will open on Thursday, Feb. 13

A twisted storyline makes the movie

Kaufman's 'Adaptation' full of originality

By JOHNNY DONALDSON
Collegian Staff

"Adaptation" is a picture that's like looking into a mirror that's facing a mirror. The movie pulsates with a wicked glint of trickery and rejoins Charlie Kaufman, the man who came up with the twisted funhouse mirror of "Being John Malkovich," with "Malkovich" director Spike Jonze. The result is a vast improvement over the house-of-cards whimsy of their previous film. The eccentric gimmickry of "Malkovich" is still there, but Kaufman's overloaded solipsism has been replaced by the real nuances and craft of storytelling.

'Adaptation'
Directed by Spike Jonze
Starring Nicolas Cage, Meryl Streep
Columbia
114 mins.

Kaufman was originally hired to adapt "The Orchid Thief," Susan Orlean's nonfiction story of a flower-obsessed rural man named John Laroche, into a movie. Finding Orlean's off-shoots on Seminoles and plant adaptation impossible to turn into scenes of the silver screen, a frustrated Kaufman ended up writing a story in which Charlie Kaufman, the man behind "Being John Malkovich," is hired to adapt the book "The Orchid Thief" for the screen, but finds the book impossible to adapt, so he ends up writing a screenplay about a screenwriter named Charlie Kaufman, who's hired to adapt the non-fiction work "The Orchid Thief" as a movie.

You see where I'm going with this.

"Adaptation" opens with Nicolas Cage as a balding, compulsively neurotic Kaufman, soliloquizing in his own head during a meeting with a studio executive. "Do I have an original thought in my head, my bald head?" Kaufman murmurs to himself undercutting himself with, well, himself.

As presented in "Adaptation," Charlie Kaufman is not a pleasant man. He's not mean or egotistical; rather, he's the opposite, shriveled and shrunken by his own nagging insecurities. He can't bring himself to kiss a lovely friend who obviously has deep affection for Charlie. When he's given the task of adapting "The Orchid Thief," Charlie holes up in his little apartment and finds himself desperately unable to start his work. The book, as fascinating as it is, juts off into so many tangents that the hapless writer cannot pair it down to its pure essence.

Right at the first meeting, Charlie lets the executive know about his feelings towards Hollywood movies. Charlie wants to write an "honest" movie about flowers, one that doesn't apply the usual Hollywood tricks of guns, sex and people overcoming the odds to prevail. Charlie also has a twin, Donald, who's the merry apotheosis of Charlie. Donald is balding and overweight, but is filled with boundless enthusiasm and confidence. When he decides to be a screenwriter just like his brother, he cheerfully embraces the very things that Charlie decries. As Charlie struggles to even start his screenplay, Donald writes and sells a nonsensical serial killer saga entitled, "The Three," in which cop, victim and killer are all the same guy.

The movie bends backward and forward in time, between Charlie's struggles with the screenplay and three years earlier as Orlean (played here by a moving, funny and even sexy Meryl Streep) undergoes a series of meetings with Laroche (a very funny Chris Cooper), who has no front teeth, yet has a charisma that draws Orlean to him. Orlean's home life is distant and removed; the more Orlean uncovers about Laroche's unquenchable obsession with flowers, the more she wants to feel possessed by such feelings.

Was Orlean really feeling this way? Orlean does say, "I suppose I do have one unembarrassed passion...I wanted to know what it feels like to care about something passionately." But are the scenes between Orlean and Laroche – at least in the beginning stretches of the movie – truth? Are they inventions of Charlie Kaufman, the screenwriter? Or are they fantasies of Charlie Kaufman, the character? One of the great jokes about the Rubik's cube plotting of "Adaptation" is that we never know. The multi-tiered humor of Kaufman's script bounces and circles around, beginning and ending in places we never quite expect. This is essentially the boldest, most vibrant comedy of the year.

As the third act approaches, "Adaptation" takes a turn that viewers will either love or hate. Me, I fell for the ending as much as I did for the beginning. The quirky twist is almost seamless as the movie switches gears, and those who are seduced (some people may be too enraptured with the opening to stomach the close) may giggle in appreciation at Jonze and Kaufman's witty detour.

In the end, the movie isn't just a clever and smart comedy, but a genuinely profound and provocative exploration on the natures of passion, creativity and redemption. Unlike the shallow, look-at-how-clever-we-are narcissism of "Being John Malkovich," there is something to the duo's smirky pop-culture giddiness. And they have assembled a dream cast for the project, notably Cage, who gives his best performance in years. The actor creates not one, but two, wholly human characters. Without using the aid of any special make-up, Cage ably distinguishes between both the real life Charlie and the fictional Donald just by using different body and vocal techniques. Streep, who hasn't been on-screen in awhile, reminds us of how exceptional an actress she is, while Cooper turns his Laroche into an unlikely (to say the least) sex symbol. And, in one final joke, the screenplay is credited to Charlie and Donald Kaufman.

There's the original radio edit of the mournful Goth ballad "Safe," as well as a remake courtesy of cult metal group KMFDM, which manages an even eerier vibe than the original. The rest consists of live recordings that sound like nothing more than mindless screaming. Musical ingredients get reduced to an incoherent snarl from lead singer Mercedes Lander, while the tuneless riffage makes mincemeat of melody and harmony.

Two-man, Norway band, Röyksopp, set a wake up call with 'Melody A.M.'

Electronic synthesizers help create a techno sound on par with Moby and his signature style

By JOHNNY DONALDSON
Collegian Staff

Depending on your outlook, you can either blame or thank Moby and the mega-success of his multiplatinum release "Play" for the current vogue in chill-out/down-tempo techno music. The huge marketing push for the unlikely bestseller drew cries of sellout from purists – Moby licensed every song on the album – but it also drew much attention to the genre as a whole, a genre once owned primarily by Ibiza club kids winding down after night long bacchanals on the beach.

Röyksopp
'Melody A.M.'
Astralwerks

Nowadays, a quick listen to the genre brings up dreaded thoughts of gratingly cool downtown stores and oxygen bars, the kinds of places that attract the rich, jaded and hipster-chic. This is the kind of music that now underscores fancy advertisements for shiny new cars (Telepopmusik's "Breathe" plays prominently in a Mitsubishi ad). It is music that can sometimes play like electronica's answer to elevator Muzak: repetitive mush without a real center to support it.

Not that all chill-out music is as horribly depressing, or as fit for such a sad fate as background music for an even trendier store than the Gap. The smooth ambient jazz of Zero 7's "Destiny" was one of last year's ten best songs. The New York based lounge-pop trio Ivy put out two excellent albums within one year of each other, while Dido's "Here With Me" remains an unheralded classic.

When chill-out music works, it doesn't bring to mind sights of trendy boutique stores, but of stark gray-cloud skies and the journey home after a night spent at the club writhing to more propulsive techno thumpers. When it works, chill-out music becomes extremely sad music jolted by a tingle of happiness. It turns into a plaintive sigh to the heavens, which is why Moby – a master of the genre – was able to achieve such success.

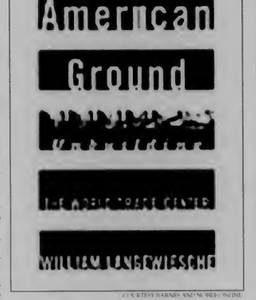
The knob-twirling duo that makes up Norway's Röyksopp consists of two men with hard-to-pronounce names: Svein Berge and Torbjorn Brundtland. "Melody A.M." cradles itself in the kind of lush, moody atmospherics that the style is often known for. You can hear it in the celestial electro-whistling that makes up "Eple," or in the erotic slow-fuse groove of "Sparks."

Röyksopp's mostly evasive vocals concentrate on thick, swirling clouds of mood. Anneli Drecker provides some aloof, smoky moans on "Sparks;" Erland Oye comes close to yodeling on "Poor Leno," which has a throbbing, sweat-stoked body. Oye also appears on the listless "Remind Me," the only other track to prominently mix vocals with beats.

Mostly it's Brundtland and Berge crafting a series of pretty, spangly down-tempo cuts. "Melody A.M." has a headier first half, as the latter stretches often drift into the ether.

The front is loaded with songs like "In Space," which has a pleasing glassy shimmer, and the thumping chant of "So Easy." Fans of Moby will be delighted by "A Higher Place," a gospel shudder not unlike something the vegan pioneer would craft.

"Röyksopp's Night Out" uses its seven-minute running time to repeatedly shift moods, veering from a promising late night stutter to what sounds like a '70s porn theme. The song gets lost in its own tangle of missed opportunities. Similarly, "She's So" and "40 Years Back\Come" get lost within themselves.



"Melody A.M." comes with a bonus disc that features four more dance-floor ready remixes, two each of "Remind Me" and "Poor Leno." The Someone Else's Mix of "Remind Me" has a disco-like Kylie Minogue beat, and is better than either the original or the Ernest St. Laurent Moonfish Mix, which sounds supremely goofy thanks to the '80s Nintendo synths and froggy vocals. Röyksopp's Istanbul Forever Take for "Poor Leno" wilts early, while the Silicone Soul Hypno House Dub has a strangely magnetic, neon-rave pull.

There are times when "Melody A.M." flirts with being that kind of boutique store Muzak swamp. But "Melody A.M." also hints at a desolate, icy gorgeousness. Röyksopp have gleaned the ability to craft mournful electronica that evokes dreamy emotions and ecstatic rapture. They're far cooler than a Mitsubishi ad.

Clergy and firefighters speak out against ground zero book

By DEEPTI HAJELA
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Clergy, firefighters and others protested at a publishing company yesterday, outraged by a book they claim includes lies about looting and disrespect toward human remains at ground zero.

COURTESY BARNES AND NOBLE BOOKSELLERS

'American Ground: Unbuilding the World Trade Center' sets controversy among its readers.

"American Ground: Unbuilding the World Trade Center" by William Langewiesche has infuriated firefighters and others because it includes a passage relating the discovery of dozens of new jeans from The Gap – still tagged, folded and stacked – inside the cab of a fire truck pulled from the rubble.

The protesters, including many who spent time at the recovery operation, denied any looting of The Gap had taken place.

"We are looking to getting the historical record cleared," said Rhonda Roland Shearer, director of the WTC Living History Project.

The book is among the finalists for the National Book Critics Circle awards, and the protesters called for the nomination to be withdrawn. A call left with the critics' organization president seeking comment was not immediately returned.

The book also raises the issue of whether bodies recovered at the site were treated differently based on whether they were firefighters.

"I was down there. ... I saw our recovery was honorable," said Bill Butler, who lost his firefighter son, Tom, on Sept. 11. "We gave a canine from the Port Authority an honor guard. ... This guy is crazy."

In interviews, Langewiesche has defended the accuracy of his book. A longtime correspondent with The Atlantic Monthly, Langewiesche was granted full access to the cleanup site, where he conducted extensive interviews over several months.

The book is published by North Point Press, a division of Farrar, Straus and Giroux. A version originally appeared in The Atlantic Monthly.

In a statement, the publisher defended the book and said it had been vigorously fact-checked.

"We have carefully reviewed the responses received, as we will continue to do, but we have found nothing to date to challenge the integrity of 'American Ground'," the publisher said. "We continue to stand by William Langewiesche's work."

Knitting steadily gaining popularity as a daily pastime among younger generations

By ERIN MCCLAM
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – With the concentration of a pool shark lining up a shot, Priya Pillutla leans over a broad sheet of green fabric, steadies a large pair of scissors and makes a cut.

"It's going to be a wool skirt," the 25-year-old medical student said. "And I got this stuff for just $4 a yard."

Suddenly, sewing has joined knitting as a hobby for 20- and 30-somethings.

How-to books are selling well and instructors say classes are packed with young people from Los Angeles to New York. And stores that stock the tools of the craft – thick spools of knitting yarn to tiny sewing-machine bobbins – are doing brisk business. "It's very 2003," said Elissa Meyrich, who teaches sewing and knitting five nights a week from a cozy studio in Manhattan's Garment District. "All of a sudden this stuff is cool – not fuddy-duddy anymore."

The crafts have gained steam in the past year. The sagging economy has dried up fat personal wardrobe budgets and the cable design hit "Trading Spaces" has helped create a new wave of do-it-yourselfers.

Meyrich said her two and half hour introductory sewing class is overflowing. She teaches it several nights a week for $70. Sales of her book "Sew Fast Sew Easy," which was published last summer, have picked up.

Mattie Kennedy, a 33-year-old executive assistant, took the class after she found a 1950s-era Singer sewing machine at a street-side junk sale.

"I never wanted to take home ec in school," she said. "I thought I was going to have to stay home and have babies. But this is so creative."

With a boost from celebrity enthusiasts that include Julia Roberts and Cameron Diaz, knitting has also turned into more than warm-and-fuzzy scarves doled out at Christmas. Sites Cousins, who makes custom clothing and costumes for television and movies, said her knitting class in Los Angeles is more popular than ever.

She's determined to make knitting more than a solitary, armchair hobby. She turns it into a social event, serving martinis and homemade dishes on Tuesday nights while her students learn the craft in comfortable, low-slung chairs.

And her students go beyond working up a version of grandma's cable-knit sweater. She teaches them how to knit ponchos, wraps – even knitted cell phone covers.

"They just come in, sit down and relax," she said. "They walk out of there, and they can do something they couldn't do when they entered my store. I love that."

She said her latest clients include actors Sandra Bullock and Kates Sagal.

Cousins traces the renewed popularity directly to Sept. 11, 2001. Since the attacks, she said, people are hungry to make meaningful things with their hands, and to connect with time-honored family traditions.

And she has all the evidence she needs of the new mainstream appeal of sewing and knitting when she looks at the faces of her students. Next week, eight new students will take up needle and yarn. They are all men.

"All of a sudden, I have guys in the classes," she said. "People are so hungry to keep things alive that used to be. It's an old craft, and now it's becoming so popular. It's inspiring."

A new wave of do-it-yourselfers has surfaced over the year, the Associated Press reports. Such a surge of interest has caused knitting to steadily gain popularity among the younger population.

LeBron James reinstated

AKRON, Ohio (AP) – LeBron James was cleared to play Wednesday by a judge who temporarily blocked a state ruling that stripped the high school basketball star of his eligibility.

James, expected to be the No. 1 pick in the NBA draft, can rejoin his team but must sit out one more game this season, Summit County Judge James Williams ruled.

St. Vincent-St. Mary was allowed to decide what game James will miss, and it picked the one on Feb. 23. The Fighting Irish, No. 1 in the USA Today rankings for the fourth straight week, have four games left before the playoffs.

James already sat out a game after the Ohio High School Athletic Association declared him ineligible for the rest of the season because he accepted old two free sports jerseys worth a total of $845.

The judge scheduled another hearing for Feb. 14, when he will decide whether to grant a permanent injunction or go to trial.

"Neither side is going to be happy," Williams said. "There are a number of issues the court wants to hear."

Williams said that James would suffer "immediate and irreparable injury" without a temporary restraining order.

If Williams grants a permanent order, James would regain his eligibility and the school would regain a victory it had it forfeit as part of the athletic association ruling.

The team's next game is Saturday in Trenton, N.J., and three of its remaining regular-season games are before the next hearing.

Lawyer for the athletic association and James presented their arguments to the judge during a one-hour hearing.

James did not attend OHSAA commissioner Clint Mussato was at the hearing but did not immediately comment on the ruling.

"He wants to finish what he started," James attorney Fred Nance told the judge. "He didn't want to let his team down. He didn't want to let his school down."

"He's really remorseful," Nance said. "He's a 16-year-old kid but he didn't deserve the ultimate punishment of losing his eligibility."

Nance pointed to court documents filed Tuesday that showed 8 senior kid making errors, who accepted two-dollar jerseys from the owner of a Cleveland clothing store. James has since returned the items.

All LeBron did was receive a gift from a friend, a reward for his academics, a James spokesman said. He had a 3.5 grade point average. The LeBron scandal is capitalize on his time, his experience could be in the millions of dollars."

The state athletic association found that the items cost James the Gale Sayers and Wes Unseld jerseys in exchange for being let go. James to be disciplined in any way.

Mussato said that James broke an amateur rules by capitalizing on athletic fame by receiving money or gifts of monetary value.

mound resulted in UMass wins. Arnold started five games for the Minutewomen in 2002, all complete-game victories.

"[Arnold] is the rising newcomer," Sortino said.

"She's the one that is going to have people surprised."

The third spot in the Minutewoman rotation should belong to up-and-coming freshman Jenna Busa. While Busa has yet to toss a pitch at the collegiate level, Sortino has noticed improvement each day and is confident that she can make some positive contributions to the team.

Junior Jamie Cahalan is once again expected to catch every game this season, something that she has done since arriving at UMass two years ago. Last season, Cahalan earned the distinction of an A-10 All-Tournament selection, and has even been named a co-captain for the Minutewomen in only her junior year.

"Jamie is the total team player," said Sortino. "She's willing to sacrifice anything for the good of the order. Plus, she has outstanding leadership skills."

While Cahalan has yet to give coach Sortino a reason to replace her, senior Jessica Bartlett has developed the reputation of being a dependable and talented backup.

"[Bartlett] has great expertise and is definitely dependable," Sortino said.

The Minutewomen not only lost half of their infield to graduation in 2002, but they also lost two all-conference players in second baseman Ashley Bakken and third baseman Scooter Wheeler. Sophmore Hilars Puglia and freshman Kristi Stefanoni will compete for the vacancy left by Bakken at second.

"Hilary and Kristi bring different attributes," Sortino said. "Hilary is smooth, Kristi is gutty. Offensively, they both have great capability and speed."

Although it may take the entire season for Sortino to decide who is the more qualified second basemen, she is happy that such a difficult decision is a reflection of the team's deep talent.

"It's a great tough choice to have," Sortino said. "While I have the information from practice, you don't really know what's going to happen until you get into the war. We'll see who rises to the occasion in the battle. I have a feeling that both of them will. It's going to be tough, but that's a good problem to have."

Senior Brandi Cross returns to start at first base for the Minutewomen. Cross, who has impressed both her teammates and coaches with her ability on the field, should also provide an offensive spark for UMass.

"Brandi is an outstanding hitter who has grown into a very talented first baseman," said Sortino. "She makes bad throws look easy. She makes us look good."

After sitting out the entire 2002 season as a redshirt freshman, Jasmine Edwards appears to be a solid backup to Cross at first base. Originally recruited as a pitcher, Edwards shows great promise for not only this season, but for several seasons to come.

"[Edwards] is learning a little bit more every day," Sortino said. "She's potentially one of the finest bats that we will ever see here."

The Minutewomen's fifth all-time run scorer, senior Emily Robustelli, will occupy the shortstop position. Robustelli, who has a knack for getting on base, has 118 career runs-scored and a career batting average of .282.

"[Robustelli] is an extraordinary leadoff hitter," said Sortino. "She's probably the best bat that we have right now."

Junior infielder Nicole Wilson has made the most out of her two years as a member of the team, and has established herself as a solid third baseman. However, Wilson's position on the left side of the diamond will be challenged this season by freshman talent Katie Jo Kelley. While both have demonstrated their arm strength and athleticism, Sortino is confident in both players' abilities.

"Nicole is a very good athlete, and Kelley is a very strong hitter with a very strong arm," Sortino said.

Roaming behind the bases will be an experienced group of talented outfielders for UMass. Anchored by senior Anna Percy and junior Aisha Franke, the Minutewomen boast one of the most talented outfields in the team's history.

Percy, who batted .324 last season with 16 stolen bases, has become a crowd pleaser over the years with her tenacious play and blood-and-guts attitude.

Regarded by Sortino as the best athlete on the team, Franke was also a force for the Minutewomen in 2002. Her .340 batting average was fifth best in the conference and her 16 stolen bases tied fellow outfielder Percy for the team high.

"Aisha is very strong, very fast, and has just totally expanded her horizons," Sortino said. "She was a great contributor last year and should be an even greater contributor this year."

Junior K.C. Budrewicz will add even more experience to an already veteran outfield for UMass. Sophomores Denise Denis and Pam Sulick, along with freshmen Shannon Houle, Sharon DeMello and Lesley Ferrara should also see playing time in the outfield for UMass.

With a roster that is saturated in talent and also has a strong work ethic, the softball team could be the only 2003 UMass squad with a realistic shot at a National Championship. From centerfield to home plate, the Minutewomen have what could potentially be the best team in the program's history.

Of course, championships are not won on paper. Talent will only carry a team so far. If the Minutewomen hope to finish their season in Oklahoma City battling for the national crown, they will have to match their ability with desire. The coming weeks will give them the opportunity to showcase their ability against some of the top programs in the nation. However, it is the months and dozens of games thereafter that will determine their desire for national supremacy.

"More than anything, this season is all about getting back to the World Series," Holtz said. "At the end of the year, I'm hoping that I'll be able to say that this truly was the greatest team to ever wear a UMass uniform."

A Canadian look at sports coverage

Does anyone know why "SportsCenter" hasn't shown us highlights of Jeff Hornacek taking his kids to Jim's Barber Shop for their monthly cut? Or why it hasn't gone in-depth on Ray Bourque's decision to give his wife roses on Valentine's Day? How about Jeremy Roenick eating dinner? Or Barry Bonds breathing?

Sometimes it's difficult to comprehend the decisions made by the almighty network. Here's an idea. How about taking that small amount of Find-A-Sports-Celebrity seconds and give the American public a taste of The World's most savored game.

Ever heard of soccer? For every non-U.S. country (that leaves the rest of them), it's a way of life. And for many, it is life. So why does ESPN ignore soccer like it's a frog-jumping competition?

I've seen dog shows and spelling bees on "SportsCenter." I've seen hotdog-eating races and unusual acrobatics. Yesterday, I saw two women mullet it out in the National Nail Hammering Competition, I think. All of that is waggish and whimsical, and I'm always up for a good laugh. But being an international soccer fan isn't so amusing when the only highlight you get is an "America's Funniest Home Videos" type gaffe, as anchor Linda Cohn so generously offered yesterday in "Today's Best."

"And he kicks the Iranian in the head," she said, laughing, to describe the scene of an Iranian soccer player getting accidentally booted in the face by a leaping opponent. That's surely better than any ball-on-a-string, 90-degree-mid-flight-change-of-direction type of goal. Better than any masterful, make-your-defender-stumble, almost implausible sort of footwork. It's better than everything except, maybe, someone's leg falling off.

In Montreal this past weekend, after flipping past curling, professional lacrosse (which America has also ignored) and Oprah dubbed in French, I stumbled upon TSN, Canada's version of "SportsCenter." ESPN and TSN are affiliated networks. In America, it's "SportsCent-er" and in Canada it's "SportsCent-re." Same logo. Same setup.

But the content is different. TSN shows everything American we're used to. Plus highlights of the Canadian leagues. Plus soccer highlights. Soccer made up only a total of maybe one minute. But that's a lot in terms of broadcast seconds. I'm only asking ESPN for maybe 30. I'd take 10.

But, because I live in the U.S., the We-Need-Scoring-Hitting-Celebrities-Or-Controversy-Every-10-Seconds-of-America, I won't get it. Instead, I'll get referee-shoving technicals, gallons of Kournikova-drool, obscene gestures to the crowd and whining about a tied baseball game. Over and over and over. Until the next high school basketball player backs his new Hummer into an elderly woman's vehicle.

Even without that nonsense, soccer isn't popular because Americans can't appreciate a play if it doesn't result in some type of point. We like dunks, home runs, and touchdowns. Not step-overs, volleys and ball-drags.

Hockey is the least popular of our major sports because like soccer, most people don't understand its non-scoring elements (toe-drags and dekes), things which hockey is based on. It's not always goals.

But for ESPN, which actually has a separate web page dedicated to soccer, that's tough to explain. There's just not enough time in a "SportsCenter" broadcast, right?

That's fine. I guess the five-plus billion people who don't live here have no clue what they're talking about. I haven't had enough of John Elway anyway.

LeBron deserves benefit of doubt the University of Akron to accommodate the number of fans wanting to watch him play? Was he the one that convinced ESPN to air a pair of his games and send Dick Vitale and Bill Walton to check him out?

Of course he didn't convince anyone to do these things. The hype created by the young man brought on these changes. It made his high school, St. Vincent-St. Mary, decide to play a national schedule and open up the cash register.

ESPN decided that sending its most prestigious analysts to cover two of his games – and designate an entire segment of "SportsCenter" to the breakdown of his game – would be worthwhile.

It was inevitable. With the success of other high school players – Kobe Bryant, Kevin Garnett, Al Harrington, Jermaine O'Neal to name a few – jumping directly to the NBA, some player was going to come around and grab the national spotlight while still in high school.

Like any of us wouldn't become a bit cocky if we were coddled the way James has been.

But he hasn't really shown any bouts of superstardom. Sure, he refers to himself as "King James," but it seems to be more in fun than in self-adoration. In fact, LeBron has even used his fame in positive ways.

One story that didn't receive the media attention happened on Jan. 14, when James brought a nine-year-old boy from Akron, Ohio to his matchup with Mentor. The young man, Davonte Greer, had lost his sister and two cousins in a fire just two weeks before. He was given a James T-shirt and sat on the sideline directly behind St. Vincent-St. Mary's bench. When James was announced to the crowd, he brought Greer with him to the team huddle and to center court. Greer even got a seat in James' postgame press conference, where James called him an inspiration and "my little guy."

But that bout of decency was overshadowed by the first of two events that would make James seem more like a scoundrel than deserved.

His mother, who is reminding everyone of Philadelphia star Allen Iverson's mom, bought him the $50,000 Hummer for his 18th birthday. Apparently, she was able to get the loan from the bank based on who her son was. After all, a loan for $50K will be easily paid off come July.

Of course, the public outcry was followed with an investigation into whether that act was in violation of James' amateur status, as he or any other amateur athlete is not allowed to accept gifts based on fame.

When the Ohio High School Athletic Association found him in the clear, James made a bigger, more cut-and-dry mistake. He accepted two throwback jerseys, of Wes Unseld and Gale Sayers, worth a total of $845.

James was ruled ineligible for accepting the gift based on his fame and the 'Bron haters rejoiced. But James was reinstated yesterday, having only to serve a two-game suspension.

This decision won't please anyone. First of all, there are many who were thrilled to see James punished for accepting the jerseys. They claim that he sold out his team to take advantage of his fame and get some expensive wear.

This is just a stupid argument. If James only cared about himself, he wouldn't have given back the jerseys and appealed the ruling. He claims he was simply accepting a gift from a friend, a reward for his solid academics – he claims to have a 3.5 grade point average.

If all 'Bron cared about was the money, why play the rest of the season? He could easily have just taken the rest of the season off, signed the insane sneaker contract that he is guaranteed from either Nike or Adidas and stay healthy until the NBA Draft and signing day.

Instead, James fought to risk his health and future for his team and the chance to play for the Ohio State Championship. That's a team player, not a criminal or a jerk.

James isn't Mike Tyson or O.J. Simpson. He hasn't committed any crimes and hasn't hurt anyone, except for an occasional defender via an ankle-breaking crossover.

LeBron James isn't what is wrong about sports. His coverage may represent what is wrong with sports media, but don't take that out on an otherwise good kid who may be the future of basketball.

Rematch against BU likely to bring fans out tion for coach Jack Parker's troops.

"BU is BC and they will come out ready to play no matter who they are playing," he said. "If they are concentrating on the Beanpot, that's their problem. I'm sure Coach Parker will have them ready to play."

Saturday night, the Maroon and White will face off against the River Hawks (9-14-3, 2-12-2 HE), who have come on somewhat strong as of late, after starting the season 0-8 in conference contests. UML tied Merrimack on Tuesday night, 1-1.

The Minutemen swept a weekend series against the River Hawks earlier this season in November – downing them by scores of 6-3 and 4-3, earning UMass the Alumni Cup for the 2002-03 slate.

"It's always a worry when you play a big team that you're going to have a letdown the next game," Turner said. "What we have to do is take it one game at a time – we'll worry about BU, and then we'll worry about Lowell on Saturday."

For the second straight weekend, the Minutemen will face two different opponents on consecutive nights, which means that the coaching staff cannot focus on just one squad.

"We've played all these teams now twice, so everybody knows everybody by now," said Turner, who is second on the team (28 points) in scoring. "I think it's more of a mental thing. If you can get ready mentally for each night, you just need to worry about that."

The weekend will also represent the beginning of a solid home stand for the Maroon and White. It plays five games in the Mullins Center over the next three weeks, before hitting the road against Merrimack in the season finale.

"Now we've got five games at home which is really good for us," Kuiper said. "We went to Florida and then we got back and have had a lot of away games. The guys are a little tired and probably sick of the bus rides. We've done well at home. I think this stretch at home is really good for us, it can change things around."

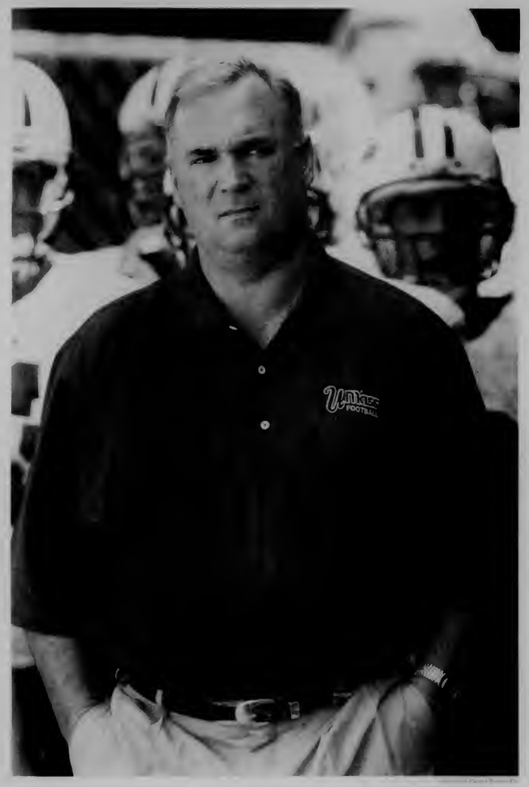
"I think that's something we needed," Turner said. "We're a young team and we've played a lot of road games in the past month. Now that we're coming home on a five-game stretch, it's going to be good for us physically and mentally."

And in addition to getting off the road, the Mullins Center has been quite friendly to the pucksters this season. The Minutemen are 9-4-0 in Amherst this season.

"I think home ice is a huge advantage, especially in this league," Turner said. "It's always nice to have your fans there and your students there and I can't wait for this weekend. I think it's going to be a big crowd, and I think it plays a big role."

Last weekend, the Minutemen dropped a pair of conference contests on the road to BC and Providence, extending their losing streak to three games and their road losing streak to five. That weekend, it was evident that the long season had taken its toll on the Maroon and White, especially with the multitude of freshmen and sophomores on the team.

"Everyone's tired – mentally, physically – even I am," Kuiper said, "but I'm just trying to enforce to the young guys that now's not the time to slow down because this is the time when the other teams go even harder."



Freshman forward Stephen Werner is tied for third on the Minutemen with 26 points. The Mass Attack returns to the Mullins Center this weekend for games against Boston University and UMass-Lowell.

Whipple announces 2003 recruiting class

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple came into the recruiting process knowing one thing.

If he could just fill a few holes, his Minutemen, who finished the 2002 season at 8-4 (6-3 Atlantic 10), would be the team to beat in the conference in 2003.

Entering next year, Whipple has the A-10's best returning quarterback, arguably its best returning running back and a very, very good defensive unit. All he needed was to add some quality depth at wide receiver, fill in two holes in the kicking game and acquire some big bodies for the trenches.

Mission accomplished.

"We addressed some things that we needed and [I think] it will take us to the next level," Whipple said.

Going deep...and high

Whipple, whose team lost three quality wide receivers to graduation – Adrian Zullo, Deshon Hardy and Neal Brown – has to get some production out of a freshman wide receiver this year.

Whipple nabbed two wideouts he expects to compete for major playing time.

"I felt like we had guys who could run," Whipple said of returning receivers Jason Peebler and Jimmy Howard. "Now we have [some height]."

Brandon London, who stands 6-foot-4, signed on after one year of post-graduate ball at Fork Union Military Academy.

"Brandon is an explosive young man who is still growing," UMass assistant coach Chris Malone said. "He has a tremendous work ethic, and will provide a great target as a wideout due to his size."

Rasheed Rancher will give London the biggest push for the third receiver spot.

"Rasheed is a big target at wide receiver, who is extremely agile and runs great routes," assistant coach Sean Spencer said. "He is a playmaker with the ability to go the distance every time he touches the ball."

"I wanted to go out and get at least one big receiver. We got two that I think are really talented," Whipple said. "I felt like, in our red zone, we needed some things in that area. [Their height] will also help the running game [and] the blocking."

Along with London and Rancher, Whipple inked Rickey Dias from Rehoboth, Mass. and J.J. Moore from St. Petersburg, Fla.

Big cleats to fill

The kicking game was one of the Maroon and White's greatest strengths last season. But both punter David Sanger and placekicker Doug White have graduated.

A championship-caliber team must have a reliable kicking game, so Whipple went out and nabbed a veteran kicker, Matt Goldstein, who transferred from the University of New Mexico. Goldstein is currently enrolled at UMass and will participate in Spring practice.

Freshman C.J. Koegel will take over the punting duties for the Maroon and White. Koegel, who comes to Amherst from Deerfield Beach, Fla. will also get a chance to handle the kickoff duties. Koegal averaged 43.6 yards per punt as a senior and 48.9 ypp as a junior.

"They probably have better leg strength than both [Sanger and White]," Whipple said. "Now they just need the experience."

Twice as nice

Bayonne, N.J. running back Bryan Smith got a lot of offers. Word is, Maryland and Clemson wanted the services of the 6-foot-2, 190-pound tackle-breaker who rushed the ball 208 times for 1,687 yards and 26 touchdowns as a high school senior. But there was one catch – he has a twin brother Brandon who can also play a little football.

"Their parents insisted that they go together and Bryan was offered [scholarships] by just about everybody," Whipple said.

But Brandon, despite being a solid linebacker for Bayonne High School, didn't get the upper-echelon offers that Bryan did.

Whipple was happy to give them both a shot.

"We would have recruited both of them separately if they were two different guys," Whipple said.

But while Brandon will definitely be a key contributor in the future at UMass, Bryan is certainly one of the gems of this recruiting class.

"Bryan is another outstanding running back from New Jersey, who we feel can make a major impact on our program," assistant coach Mike Cassano said. "He is an outstanding athlete, like Marcel Shipp and R.J. Cobbs, but has more height and speed. Bryan is a very natural runner who sets up his blocks very well with his patience and outstanding vision. He is a home run hitter, who is a legitimate threat to score every time he touches the ball."

"He's a monster."

Looking to bulk up the middle of his defensive line, Whipple inked a pair of large tackles who will plug the lanes for the Minutemen this year.

"We have a lot of athletes [on the defensive line]," Whipple said. "We don't have a real big guy. [Defensive Coordinator] Tom [Masella] wanted that to be an emphasis."

First, Whipple signed Indiana University transfer Colin Christopher, who will step right in and contribute. At 6-foot-3, 305 pounds, Christopher played 11 career games for the Hoosiers and made 24 tackles, with five tackles for a loss and three sacks.

"Colin's experience playing in the Big Ten will have an instant impact," Spencer said. "He plays with a great deal of leverage, and we expect him to be a force at nose guard."

But if Christopher is big, junior college transfer Robert Savitsky is huge. At 6-foot-6, 335 pounds, Savitsky will be near-impossible to move out of any running hole.

"He's a monster," Whipple said. "He's huge."

Etc.

Whipple expects Tracy Belton, a defensive back from Fork Union Military Academy, to contribute right away.

"He's a mature kid," Whipple said. "A little more physical [than most freshman DBs]."

Lorenzo Perry, last year's 2002 Gatorade Player of the Year in Rhode Island, is expected to help out immediately on special teams, where UMass lost two key return men in Zullo and Hardy.

"I think [Perry] will help us right away catching punts," Whipple said.

Whipple announces 2003 recruiting class

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple came into the recruiting process knowing one thing.

If he could just fill a few holes, his Minutemen, who finished the 2002 season at 8-4 (6-3 Atlantic 10), would be the team to beat in the conference in 2003.

Entering next year, Whipple has the A-10's best returning quarterback, arguably its best returning running back and a very, very good defensive unit. All he needed was to add some quality depth at wide receiver, fill in two holes in the kicking game and acquire some big bodies for the trenches.

Mission accomplished.

"We addressed some things that we needed and [I think] it will take us to the next level," Whipple said.

Going deep...and high

Whipple, whose team lost three quality wide receivers to graduation – Adrian Zullo, Deshon Hardy and Neal Brown – has to get some production out of a freshman wide receiver this year.

Whipple nabbed two wideouts he expects to compete for major playing time.

"I felt like we had guys who could run," Whipple said of returning receivers Jason Peebler and Jimmy Howard. "Now we have [some height]."

Brandon London, who stands 6-foot-4, signed on after one year of post-graduate ball at Fork Union Military Academy.

"Brandon is an explosive young man who is still growing," UMass assistant coach Chris Malone said. "He has a tremendous work ethic, and will provide a great target as a wideout due to his size."

Rasheed Rancher will give London the biggest push for the third receiver spot.

"Rasheed is a big target at wide receiver, who is extremely agile and runs great routes," assistant coach Sean Spencer said. "He is a playmaker with the ability to go the distance every time he touches the ball."

"I wanted to go out and get at least one big receiver. We got two that I think are really talented," Whipple said. "I felt like, in our red zone, we needed some things in that area. [Their height] will also help the running game [and] the blocking."

Vols surge past UMass

Tennessee's 17-0 run too much to overcome

By ELIZABETH A. DAVIS
Associated Press

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — Ron Slay scored 21 points and Ihaydeus Holden added 15 as Tennessee beat Massachusetts 71-45 Wednesday.

The Volunteers (12-6) captured the lead early in the first half with an 11-2 run and held on with another spurt to begin the second half.

Massachusetts (8-13) tried to get back in the game after halftime with a 7-0 run. Tennessee responded with a 17-0 run over the next five minutes to push its lead to 27 and out of reach of the Minutemen.

Micah Brand scored 11 points in the first half and finished with 14 for UMass, which shot 18-of-52 from the floor.

The Maroon and White shot just 5-for-20 from the field in the second half (2-for-10 on 3-pointers) and was outscored 32-15.

The Minutemen's leading scorer Jackie Rogers was averaging 15.5 points a game, but was held to two points on 1-of-3 shooting from the floor.

UMass final score tied for its the worst of the season. The Minutemen lost to Central Connecticut State 46-45 on Dec. 2.

The Vols led 39-30 at halftime and started the second half with an 8-0 run. UMass answered with the 7-0 run that cut it to 47-37 with 14:50 remaining.

The Minutemen didn't get any closer the rest of the way as Tennessee held them scoreless for 6 1/2 minutes. The highlight during the 17-0 run came when Derek Stribling tipped a pass from a UMass player and saved it from going out of bounds. Higgins grabbed it as it bounced down the court and lobbed it to Slay, who dunked it.

Trailing 6-4 early, Tennessee had an 11-2 run to get the lead for good, 15-8 with 12:33 left.

Holden, who scored all of his points in the first half, hit a jumper from the key and made two 3-pointers from the corner during the run.

After the Vols increased their lead to 36-24 with 1:51 remaining, UMass cut the lead in half in just 39 seconds.

Anthony Anderson hit a 3 and Gabe Lee converted a three-point play, but Tennessee scored the final four points to lead by nine at halftime.

Anderson struggled on the evening, converting just 2-for-9 from the field for six points. The Lynn, Mass. native also committed five of UMass' 17 turnovers.

UMass freshman Mike Lasme was held scoreless for the second straight game. No. 1 was 0-for-6 from the field in 35 minutes of action.

Jim Pignatiello contributed to this story.

Rematch should bring strong crowd support

By MATT BRADY
Collegian Staff

You remember it. If you were anywhere near the Mullins Center on Dec. 6, you certainly remember it.

That night, the last home game before break, the Massachusetts hockey team shrugged off a three-goal Boston University lead to down the Terriers 5-4 in overtime, in front of one of the loudest Mullins Center crowds for hockey in the program's history.

"I thought [the crowd] was really good," said Minuteman defenseman Nick Kuiper. "That was the loudest I've heard them and I actually looked around and said, 'Wow, this doesn't seem like the normal Mullins Center.' I really hope that there's a lot of people and they're supporting us, because we're going to come and play hard this weekend."

Now, for the first home game of the spring semester, the same Terrier team will be looking to exact revenge on the Maroon and White this Friday, as part of a two-game home weekend for UMass. The Minutemen (14-13-1, 8-11-0 Hockey East) will play host to Lowell on Saturday night.

"I think this weekend's really important because we just came off two losses, so this is a chance to bounce back," Kuiper said. "Definitely we want to get off to a good start against BU and then beat Lowell, and we play UConn after that. But [we have to] be ready to go into Maine because we've only got six games left before the playoffs. I don't think we can afford to make any mental mistakes these last few games. We have to play hard – a lot harder and a lot smarter."

"It's a really big weekend for us," said senior captain Tim Turner, who recorded his 100th career point against Providence last weekend. "We need to get our confidence going here. We've been on a little slump lately, and there's nothing like getting your confidence going by beating BU."

A large crowd is expected for Friday's game against BU (16-10-2, 9-8-0 HE) as it not only features a nationally recognized opponent, but is also the first home game with students back in session.

"[A large crowd] makes a big difference," Kuiper said. "If you get 5,000 or 6,000 fans that are all cheering – you don't want to let them down. If you can hear them on the ice, you have that behind you. That's why teams like Maine are so hard to play against because when you go into their barn, that place is packed and everyone's rooting for them. So if we get a good turnout and they're loud, it will be good for us."

The Terriers are coming off a 2-1 defeat of Harvard Monday night in the opening round of the Beanpot. Defensemen Freddy Meyer and Bryan Miller scored for BU, who will face BC in the finals of the storied tournament this coming Monday. Still, Turner feels that will not be a distrac-

Symposia brings campus together

KRISTI JAMES/COLLEGIAN

Members of the UMass community share ideas and research at the Academic Imperative Symposia in an event that kicks off Chancellor Lombardi's inaugural commencement festivities.

By NIKKI KEENAN
Collegian Correspondent

"I'm looking to have a heck of a time," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said yesterday in the Campus Center before the University of Massachusetts Academic Imperative Symposia.

Students and faculty alike convened in the Campus Center to listen to the speeches of their fellow distinguished faculty, graduates and undergraduates.

John V. Lombardi said the purpose of t.e event was to "show the quality of the faculty and students here at UMass."

As part of the Academic Imperative, this event was organized and carried out by the Inaugural Steering Committee along with other sub-committees who helped with the preparation for the Chancellor's Inauguration and the events surrounding it.

"Many people devoted time, energy, and money to make this event happen in a classy, dignified way," said Charlena Seymour, vice chancellor of Student Affairs and Provost. "The Inauguration is an event to celebrate the teaching and research agenda of the campus. The events that are planned were designed to show off what we do best as an academic institution."

The day was filled with an array of events including speeches dedicated to research, teaching and learning.

The Learning Symposia consisted of speakers working on either their graduate or undergraduate degrees. All student speakers talked about their experiences at UMass.

"It is a privilege to be here at UMass," Caryn Anderson, a graduate Entomology student said.

Some of the students also spoke about their current research.

Sam Cushman, a graduate student whose research includes a "Hierarchical Analysis of the Species Environment Relationships," said he has nothing but the highest regard for the institution that has provided him with outstanding opportunities to work around the world and on different projects.

Professors spoke about their experience in and out of the classroom within their particular departments.

Professors Albey Reiner and Steven Goodwin of the Microbiology Department spoke about their work and their class, the biology of cancer and AIDS.

Professor Reiner, creator of the course, spoke about its impact on himself and others. He also spoke about the "mystery" of cancer and medicine and gave his thoughts and stories on the subject.

Goodwin then followed with his ideas and views on "the Challenge" of engaging students in the classroom.

Goodwin and Reiner have previously cotaught the course and Goodwin recommends "approach[ing] teaching as a team," raving about its effectiveness in the classroom.

The Symposia continued throughout the day with many other professors speaking on behalf of their work and their departments.

The Academic Imperative was designed to create a feeling of pride for those associated with UMass.

"I hope that many students...will come away inspired to pursue majors or professional careers in the many wonderful programs that we offer on campus," Seymour said.

Today the events continue with the Chancellor's Inauguration Ceremony, beginning at 10 a.m. in the Mullins Center followed by an Inauguration Luncheon.

Israeli hero dies in Columbia

By RACHEL FREEMAN
Collegian Correspondent

As Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon was considered a national hero before his death in the destruction of the space shuttle Columbia.

A former fighter pilot and weapons specialist, Ramon fought in the 1973 Yom Kippur War and in the 1982 war in Lebanon, according to Ha'aretz, a daily magazine in Israel. Ha'aretz reported that in 1981, he was a member of the mission to bomb the Iraqi nuclear reactor before it became operational.

Ramon was selected in 1997 to begin training at NASA to become Israel's first astronaut, Ha'aretz reported. Determined to represent and pay tribute to his country, Ramon packed a credit-card sized microfiche of the Bible given to him by President Moshe Katsav. Ramon also carried with him a small pencil drawing titled "Moon Landscape" by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy that was killed at Auschwitz, Ha'aretz reported.

The painting is a picture of what the Earth looks like from the moon. Ha'aretz reported that Ramon planned to pay tribute to those who endured the Holocaust.

Feeling that he represented the people of Israel as well as the entire Jewish community, Ramon requested that his food on the flight be kosher. NASA had prepared specially thermo-stabilized Kosher food, according to Babaganewz, a children's educational magazine.

Ramon felt that his flight would provide a welcome diversion for his fellow Israelis.

"I think people are very happy to be distracted by my flight," Ramon said in a news conference.

Ramon was a symbol of hope to Israelis, according to press in Israel following his death.

"It was a celebration for the country and it is ending so tragically..." Hezi, Yitzhaki, an Israeli, told Ha'aretz this week. "An entire country was so proud of him. We are already in such a had state."

According to Ha'aretz, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said that the tragedy reinforced the common bond between Israel and the United States.

"It is at times like these that we feel our common fate, identity and values, and shared vision, which we realized during Col. Ilan Ramon's journey into space," he said.

"Today Americans and Israelis come together again to mourn those seven astronauts," said Daniel Kurtzer, American amhassador to Israel, to the Israeli cabinet, according to Ha'aretz.

"In paying tribute to these heroes, our two nations can draw

Glover and Sanchez visit UMass Feb. 10

By AMY O'NEILL
Collegian Staff

In celebration of Black History Month, actor Danny Glover and poet Sonia Sanchez will be speaking at the University of Massachusetts on Monday, Feb. 10 at 7 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium in the Fine Arts Center.

Both Glover and Sanchez are well-known artists and activists who will speak on "The Responsibility of the Black Artist in the 21st Century."

Glover has appeared in numerous films including "The Color Purple," "Beloved," the "Lethal Weapon" series and "The Royal Tenenbaums." He attended San Francisco State College and from there went on to stage performing and later to films.

Traveling around the world as a Goodwill Ambassador for the United Nations since 1998, Glove is also active in promoting human rights. He has promoted reparations and debt relief for Africa nations, and is the chair of the board of the TransAfrica Forum, which deals with issues relating to Africa and the Caribbean. He is also an active board member of the Algebra Project, a math empowerment program developed by civil rights veteran Bob Moses.

Sanchez is a renowned writer, poet, playwright and activist who has been an influential force in African-American literary and political culture for over 30 years. She has lectured at over 900 universities and colleges worldwide, reading her poetry and lecturing on black culture and literature, women's liberation, peace and racial justice.

Sanchez was in the forefront of the black studies movement and taught the first course in the country on black women. She is a sponsor of Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and a board member of MADRE.

Sanchez is the author of 16 books including "Homecoming," "We a BaddDDD People," "Love Poems," "Homegirls and Handgrenades," "Like the Singing Coming off the Drums" and "Shake Loose My Skin."

The event, which is free and open to the public, is sponsored by the UMass Campus Activities Office, Office of ALANA Affairs, Chancellor's Office, University Productions and Concerts, W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies, Black Student Union and Black Mass Communications Project.

TSN gets sports coverage right

Eric Soderstrom

John Elway isn't wearing a helmet. Shoulder pads or anything resembling a uniform decorated with wild horses. He's just sitting there, agleam in a slack-fit, silk bathed collared shirt. It's that posh, "get a load of my money tree" attire. The kind owners of Arena Football League teams wear.

An entire second passes and John is now standing his clenched right fist pushing through the stadium-controlled atmosphere looking quite superior in that illustrious owner's box he's erected. Good ol' John Dutton just hit the crafty Damian Harrell for a late third quarter touchdown, and a 27-17 Colorado Crush lead. Ta-di-da.

There goes another second and John is now distraught. The resourceful Donnie Davis just found the bare-footed Tyronne Jones for a 36-yard score and a 37-33 Georgia Force advantage, with only 8:19 remaining in the final quarter. Out of John's mouth comes an irrepressible naughty word. But his vaulting hands aren't quick enough to shield the vicious blunder. Shucks.

Dutton found Harrell again late in the fourth quarter, but it wasn't enough. Final score. Wait, who cares? Somehow, the demigods at ESPN think enough people in America do, to run those 10 seconds of AFL within the Holy Writ that is (drumroll, please) "SportsCenter" (dah dah dah, dah dah dah).

Hooray for John Elway's purchase of an AFL team. It's good to see No. 7 still has some competitive will contracting those aging tendons. But keep that out of my morning wake-up routine. A guaranteed Hall-of-Fame quarterback cursing on camera isn't enough to make me fumble and drop my espresso. In the days of covered wagons and Grover Cleveland, it'd be controversial. But now, it's as household as a ceiling.

The transmission of Team Elway's loss wasn't the only AFL highlight either. Some 10 seconds earlier, viewers were given the opportunity to stare at Bill Parcells and Pat Summerall in attendance at the Dallas Desperados/New York Dragons matchup. I hope those lads had some good conversation and a splendid evening. Too bad there was no follow-up.

World Series dreaming

Softball opens with Fiesta Bowl tourney

By JEFF BOYD
Collegian Correspondent

Although the Massachusetts softball team will begin the 2003 season with a fiesta, the road to Oklahoma City and the World Series will hardly be a party.

This weekend will mark the beginning of the season for the Minutewomen, as they travel to Phoenix, Ariz. to participate in the annual Fiesta Bowl Tournament. The three-day competition should serve as a solid warm-up for the Minutewomen, who are seeking their ninth consecutive conference championship and a possible trip to the College World Series.

"I think that the team has been very diligent in terms of getting after things," coach Elaine Sortino said. "I think that we are as prepared as any other team is prepared in February."

Prior to the first pitch of the season, Sortino and the Minutewomen already find themselves ranked No. 23 in the nation. This national ranking comes despite the graduation of four seniors, including third-team All-American and Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Teri Rooney.

"The fact that the coaches poll had us seeded in the top 25 is definitely a tribute of respect to the players that are in the program and the players that we have brought into the program to reload the gun," Sortino said.

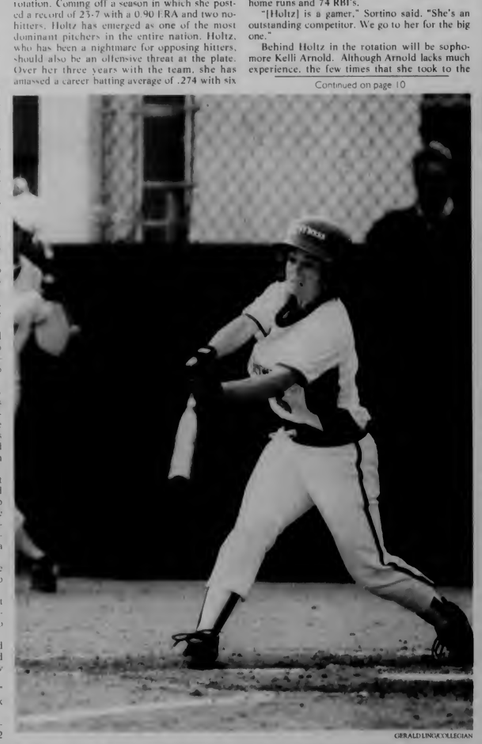
The Minutewomen will be given an early opportunity to justify their national ranking, as they will be playing against 11 teams that finished in the USA Today/NFCA Top 25 before the end of March. Among these national contenders are at least four teams from last season's World Series, including defending National Champion California.

This early stretch of tough competition won't make improving on last season's 33-15 record easy for the Minutewomen, but it should help them establish where they stand among the nation's elite programs. UMass' 33 wins last season not only gave the Minutewomen a final ranking of No. 23 in the nation, but were also a school record.

Although the entire team is honored to be ranked among the best in the nation, it is by no means satisfied.

"We're going into those tough games not looking to compete, but looking to win," co-captain Jamie Cahalan said. "We're going to try to scratch and crawl our way into the top 10."

If the Minutewomen are to make the World Series in Oklahoma City, they will need to build on their success from last season and show improvement against other top-notch teams.



"We are looking forward to the competition," Sortino said. "It sets the bar. It's a benchmark for what we need to become."

Much of UMass' success this year will be dictated by the play of its veteran leaders. The 2002 A-10 Pitcher of the Year, co-captain Kaila Holtz, should be a consistent force in the Minutewoman rotation. Coming off a season in which she posted a record of 23-7 with a 0.90 ERA and two no-hitters, Holtz has emerged as one of the most dominant pitchers in the entire nation. Holtz, who has been a nightmare for opposing hitters, should also be an offensive threat at the plate. Over her three years with the team, she has amassed a career batting average of .274 with six home runs and 74 RBI's.

"[Holtz] is a gamer," Sortino said. "She's an outstanding competitor. We go to her for the big one."

Behind Holtz in the rotation will be sophomore Kelli Arnold. Although Arnold lacks much experience, the few times that she took to the

It's time to give LeBron a break

Jim Pignatiello

"He is a jerk." "He is overrated." "He is deserving of punishment." "He shouldn't have been reinstated."

I can't help but wonder why I've heard these statements – and some worse ones – in reference to LeBron James over the past few weeks. The high school basketball superstar destined to be the No. 1 pick in this year's NBA Draft has become one of the most hated athletes without a rap sheet in the country.

I'm not sure if it is jealousy or simply overexposure that has led so many to dislike James. Maybe it is the country's tendency to root for the underdog that has made this overachiever, who seems to have the whole world in the palm of his hand at 18 years of age, so despised. Maybe the world is sick of seeing spoiled superstars get whatever they want and are attacking James in the pubescent stage of his status.

There are 100 reasons to dislike LeBron James, but very few of them are based on the young man himself.

I'll admit that I'm a fan. He's a tremendous basketball talent, probably the best high school player since Lew Alcindor, and I love the attention and excitement toward the game of basketball that has come with his rise to stardom.

Now, I don't know him that well, obviously. Certainly, I could tell you much more about the personalities of UMass' Mike Lasme or Anthony Anderson – both nice guys – better than that of 'Bron. He may turn out to be a jerk or a prima donna, but none of us know that.

Besides, with the amount of talent he has and a virtual guarantee to be financially set for life in just a few months, I can understand how the kid might be a bit full of himself. Heck, there are plenty of people down here in the Campus Center Basement who love themselves every bit as much as LeBron with far less talent at what they do.

Anyway, how can you blame James? Did he decide to move his high school games to the stadium at

Bush declares 'the game is over' for Saddam

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – In the face of stiff opposition from allies, President Bush declared Thursday "the game is over" for Saddam Hussein and urged the United Nations to join in disarming Iraq.

"Saddam Hussein will be stopped," Bush said.

The president said he would be open to a second U.N. resolution on disarmament, following up one passed last November, but only if it led to prompt action.

"The Security Council must not back down when those demands are defied and mocked by a dictator," Bush said. If the U.N. fails to act, "the United States, along with a growing coalition of nations, is resolved to take whatever action is necessary to defend ourselves and disarm the Iraqi regime."

Aides said the next few days would be dedicated to turning up pressure on reluctant allies such as France and Germany as well as other U.N. members.

Bush was silent on a timetable.

Earlier in the day, Powell stuck to the phrase the administration has been using concerning a final decision on possible war – "weeks, not months" – but White House officials noted that Bush was no longer saying consultations would last that long.

Saddam Hussein was given a final chance, he is throwing that chance away, The dictator of Iraq is making his choice," Bush said.

He spoke after meeting privately with Powell to discuss efforts to win U.N. approval of a resolution specifically authorizing the use of force. Powell, who laid out the U.S. case to the U.N. Security Council on Wednesday, told lawmakers on Thursday that the Iraqi situation would be brought to a conclusion "one way or another" in a matter of weeks.

Sticking largely to the case outlined by Powell on Wednesday, Bush said there is no doubt Saddam is not complying with the earlier U.N. order to disarm.

"Saddam Hussein recently authorized Iraqi field commanders to use chemical weapons, the very weapons the dictator tells the world he does not have," Bush said. "Saddam Hussein has the motive and the means and the recklessness and the hatred to threaten the American people. Saddam Hussein has to be stopped."

He suggested anew that there is a link between Saddam and the terrorist group al-Qaida.

"The same terrorist network operating out of Iraq is responsible for the murder – the recent murder – of an American diplomat, Lawrence Foley," Bush said.

Foley, an official for the U.S. Agency for International Development, was killed last November outside his home in Amman, Jordan.

Foreign ministers responded mostly with calls for more weapons inspections after Powell's U.N. presentation, in which he asserted that Iraq was shifting and hiding weapons and missile programs from the current inspectors.

Powell told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that most of the statements read by foreign ministers after his speech had been prepared beforehand. He said he detected a shift in attitude when he talked to 15 of the ministers in private afterward.

Still, President Jacques Chirac said Thursday France's position on war with Iraq was unchanged by Powell's presentation.

"We refuse to think that war is inevitable," Chirac said.

Powell told the senators Bush would welcome a second resolution and "many members of the Council would not only welcome it, some of them would say we require one for participation in whatever might come."

A resolution approved unanimously by the Council in November authorized a new round of U.N. weapons inspections and warned Iraq of serious consequences if it defied earlier resolutions requiring it to get rid of weapons of mass destruction.

The Bush administration has taken the position that the November resolution was sufficient backing for the use of force. But France, among other nations, does not agree.

Bush spoke to reporters without taking questions.

The president said Saddam has not accounted for a "vast arsenal" of weapons of mass destruction. "This deception is directed from the highest levels of the Iraqi regime, including Saddam Hussein, his son, the vice president and the very official responsible for cooperating with inspectors," Bush said.

Powell told the senators he had told Council members at the time of the November resolution that Iraq would be subjected to military action if it failed to comply. In fact, he said, he told ministers they should not vote for the resolution if they would not support a second resolution "when serious consequences are called for."

"Don't play that double game," he told the ministers.

Powell said on Thursday that a key to winning Security Council support would be a two-day visit to Baghdad this weekend by chief weapon inspectors Mohamed ElBaradei and Hans Blix.

CAMPUS PERSPECTIVES

By Gerald H. Ling

"Will you attend Chancellor Lombardi's inauguration ceremony and what do you think of him as the new chancellor of UMass?"

Joe Padell
Sophomore
History & Math

"Yeah, I'd go to the inauguration. Anybody who'd put a bar in the Blue Wall is O.K. by me."

Matt Lach
Senior
Industrial Engineering

"I'll go, it would be interesting to see it. He has a lot of potential. Since he decided to have a bar in the Blue Wall, he can't be bad."

Shem Stygar
Senior
Civil & Environmental Engineering

"Yes, from what I have heard about his achievements and how he has already influenced the campus, I'm excited about him as our new Chancellor."

Shulamit Goldman
Junior
Anthropology

"I probably won't go but if I do, it'll be to find out what a Chancellor does because everybody I've asked has no idea."

Tammy Wong
Junior
English & Psychology

"Yeah, I really would like to go. I think that he's going to be great. I heard him speak for the new Golden Key members and he seems to know what he wants for UMass."

Tin Ly
Senior
Economics

"No I won't. UMass can use the funds better in the academic sector than pay him that much. The money could be used in better ways."

Scientist linked to Iraq's weapons talks to UN

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – An Iraqi arms expert submitted to a private interview with U.N. weapons inspectors Thursday, hours after the top U.N. nuclear inspector demanded a "drastic change" to improve Iraq's cooperation.

The United Nations confirmed that a private interview had taken place with a biologist and that it lasted more than 3 1/2 hours.

In Washington, President Bush accused Saddam Hussein of authorizing field commanders to use chemical weapons in the event of war. He demanded quick action to disarm Iraq.

"The game is over," he declared. "Saddam Hussein will be stopped."

The interview was the first time a scientist linked to Iraq's weapons programs has spoken to inspectors without Iraqi officials present. Such interviews have been a major demand of U.N. inspectors, hoping the scientists will reveal clandestine weapons programs.

"One of our scientists is being interviewed alone, as we speak," Iraqi presidential adviser Lt. Gen. Amer al-Saadi told a Baghdad press conference. He did not give any details or identify the scientist.

Earlier Thursday, U.N. nuclear inspector Mohamed ElBaradei demanded Baghdad show greater cooperation, as he and fellow chief inspector Hans Blix briefed British Prime Minister Tony Blair on their way to Baghdad for talks this weekend.

"They need to show drastic change in terms of cooperation," ElBaradei said. "Our mission in Baghdad this weekend is crucial. We hope we will secure full, 100 percent cooperation on the part of Iraq."

Blix and ElBaradei are to present their latest report to the U.N. Security Council on Feb. 14, and Secretary of State Colin Powell said Thursday that their visit to Baghdad would be key to seeing if Iraq intends to cooperate.

In Washington, Powell told senators Thursday that "within weeks" the Iraqi situation will be brought to a conclusion "one way or another."

A day earlier, Powell laid down the U.S. case against Iraq in a speech to the Security Council, presenting tape recording, satellite photos and testimony he said constituted "irrefutable" proof that Iraq was hiding weapons of mass destruction.

Blix and ElBaradei will challenge Iraqi officials to respond to issues raised by Powell at the Security Council Wednesday, said Hiro Ueki, their spokesman. Al-Saadi and other Iraqi officials dismissed Powell's testimony as full of fabrications.

Preparations for a possible U.S.-led war on Iraq moved forward as Turkey's parliament voted to allow the United States to begin renovating military bases and ports, a first step toward opening the way for the deployment of U.S. troops.

NATO gave tentative approval to a U.S. plan to prepare to protect Turkey if it comes under counterattack from Iraq. France, Germany and Belgium had opposed the plan for weeks, but the preparations will begin Monday unless they raise new objections.

Of the 15 Council members, only the United States and Britain have offered unwavering support for forcibly disarming Saddam.

Russia and France, both with veto powers on the council, made clear Thursday that Powell's speech had not changed their minds on Iraq.

"We refuse to think that war is inevitable," President Jacques Chirac said.

In Baghdad on Thursday, al-Saadi made a sweeping attack on Powell's presentation, saying it was directed at the ill-informed. "Where's the smoking gun?" he said at a press conference.

The Iraqis insisted they have already dismantled all programs for biological, chemical and nuclear weapons. "We do not own any banned weapons, nor are we engaged in banned activity, or in deception," senior Iraqi official Hossam Mohamed Amin said. "The inspectors feel and know that."

Powell's presentation was not shown by Iraq's state television, and Thursday's newspapers, which are under tight government control, made no mention of it.

During the 1990s, previous U.N. inspection teams oversaw the destruction of many banned weapons and production programs under U.N. resolutions adopted after Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War. The new inspections, resumed in November after a four-year gap, are aimed at finding leftover weapons and determining whether the Iraqis resumed their production in the inspectors' absence.

After more than 500 inspections, the arms monitors have not produced any major evidence that Iraq has such weapons or maintains the capability to produce them.

Thursday's inspections included a military engineering academy, a brewery and an army complex that includes a missile site west of Baghdad. They also paid surprise visits to the water and sewage authority and the laboratories of a health care complex in Baghdad. Inspectors returned to a storage facility belonging to Al-Tuwaitha, the center of Iraq's former atomic program south of Baghdad, which they had inspected the day before.

Most U.S. allies want more time for U.N. weapons inspectors to do their work. But Bush has signaled his impatience with the inspections process and pledged to disarm Iraq forcibly if it does not immediately comply with U.N. resolutions – with or without its allies. The United States already has some 100,000 troops amassed in the Gulf region and the number could rise to 180,000 in a matter of weeks.

Britain on Thursday announced it was beefing up its Royal Air Force deployment in the region to 100 aircraft – including attack, transport and reconnaissance craft, as well as helicopters – for any Iraq war.

Anthrax evidence presented

By Barry Schweid and John J. Lum
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS – The intelligence information, in the U.S. view, is damning: Satellite images of almost 30 suspected weapons sites being cleaned up before U.N. inspectors arrive. Intercepted phone conversations that suggest Iraqi officers are hiding evidence from inspectors. Reports that biological weapons are already in the field.

Disclosing intelligence gathered by the government, Secretary of State Colin Powell, with CIA Director George J. Tenet at his side, laid out some of the specific reports that drive President Bush's case against Iraq.

The bottom line: The government of Saddam Hussein is making prohibited biological and chemical weapons. It is seeking nuclear weapons and long-range missiles, and maintains contact with terrorists, including those linked to al-Qaida.

Key to Powell's presentation Wednesday were satellite pictures and intercepted telephone conversations that he said showed Baghdad cleaning up suspected weapons sites days before inspectors were to show up.

Some of the material had not been given to the U.N. weapons inspectors. In clearing material earlier, the Bush administration concentrated on what could be of immediate help in the searches. Now, the inspectors will get more, Powell said.

Iraqi officials dismissed Powell's presentation as a collection of "stunts," "special effects" and "unknown sources." "It's obvious that Mr. Powell's remarks did not achieve the results the U.S. administration intended," Ambassador Mohammed Al-Douri said at the United Nations.

Powell described some sources as "people who have risked their lives to let the world know what Saddam Hussein is really up to."

Another report, cited by Powell, could be particularly worrisome for the tens of thousands of U.S. and British troops assembling around Iraq: Saddam's military already has biological weapons in the field – something Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has often asserted.

"We know from sources that a missile brigade outside Baghdad was dispersing rocket launchers and warheads containing biological warfare agents ... to various locations in western Iraq," Powell said. "Most of the launchers and warheads have been hidden in large groves of palm trees and were to be moved every one to four weeks to escape detection."

As a number of U.S. officials already privy to the information said, many of Powell's reports are circumstantial and open to interpretation – in Powell's words, no single report constitutes the long-sought "smoking gun."

The evidence is, at its roots, made up of pictures taken from orbit of trucks and buildings, recordings of suspicious words between Iraqi military officers and reports from unidentified human sources.

Taken together, they form a conclusive picture, American officials say. Powell also said this is only part of the intelligence the government has collected.

Powell's evidence also included:

- Satellite pictures, taken in May and June 2002, that Powell said showed Iraq "bulldozed and graded to conceal chemical weapons evidence" at the Al Musayyib chemical complex, and had cargo vehicles and a decontamination vehicle moving around at the site.

- Satellite pictures, taken in April 2002, of a missile research facility that Powell said showed Iraq was developing missiles that can hit Israel, Turkey, and parts of Russia. But Powell didn't say that U.N. inspectors have visited that facility regularly and found no prohibited activities taking place.

- Reports from four Iraqi informants and defectors that allege that Iraq has at least 18 trucks that it uses as mobile biological weapons labs. Powell also said the Iraqis use train cars as mobile labs.

- Old video of an Iraqi Mirage fighter jet spraying what Powell said was simulated anthrax. A defector said remote-controlled drones were capable of attacking with biological weapons.

- U.N. figures that suggest Iraq had enough material to produce 6,600 gallons of anthrax.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell examines a vial he said could contain Anthrax during a meeting of the United Nations Security Council Wednesday.

The school's main corridor was decked in black yesterday with an inscription in memory of Ramon. Wearing NASA T-shirts and with candles lit, the students of the ORT high school held a memorial service for Ramon while photographers and media from around the world documented the ceremony.

According to Ha'aretz, on the eve of his flight, Ramon said "the route to the target is more important than the target. We are going to go for the target, but we enjoy the route as well."

Preserving the past while driving towards the future

And then there were two. The plans for what will eventually become of the site of the former World Trade Center have been narrowed down to two finalists. One is by an architectural group known as the THINK team, headed by the Big Apple's own Rafael Vinoly and Frederic Schwartz. The other is by Daniel Libeskind, an architect from Berlin.

The constraints by which these two proposals, and the more than 400 others submitted, were directed included a required 6.5 to 10 million square feet of office space, 3.5 million square feet of commercial space, and a hotel. All this had to be fit into the entire center. Though officials say the design has been narrowed to these final two design plans, it is likely that neither will be built exactly as conceived now. It is also certain that there will be people unhappy with both designs.

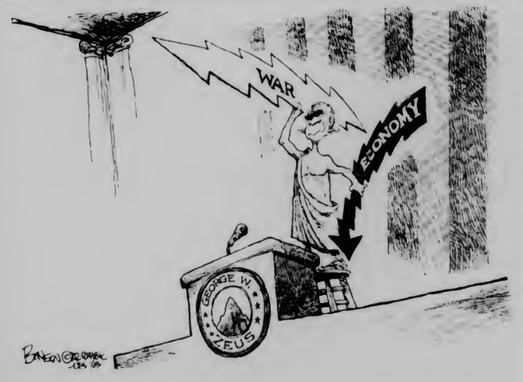
One of the plans has been called "Eiffel Towers of the 21st Century," due to its large vertical lattice structure. The other plan features towers with numerous sharp geometric shapes. Each is a stark contrast to the cold, boxy towers that stood before. People may be somewhat turned off by the futuristic appearance of the designs and their "shock" value, but isn't that the point?

There has never been a project in American history that has been scrutinized as much as what is currently being debated in lower Manhattan.

This was only the second time in American history that the United States was attacked during peacetime. The other, the ambush on the naval base at Pearl Harbor, has a monument built right over the sunken ship U.S.S. Arizona. The monument is a simple, solemn place that allows a person to reflect and ponder the past, presence, and future.

The site of the former World Trade Center will have a definite memorial of its own, in some form or another, however it also must contain all the industry that was lost on that fateful day 17 months ago. Larry Silverstein, who holds the lease to the site, already claims both final plans do not contain enough office space. When six finalists were announced last July, people complained that the plans were too heavy in the amount of office space and that the designs were boring.

It must be understood that whatever the final plans are, it is impossible to satisfy everyone. The best that can be done is to meet the requirements of the site's business obligations while doing a respectful job in honoring the memory of the nearly 3000 people who lost their lives in the attacks.



The new plans are also a chance for New York City to once again reinvent itself and shine as a beacon to the rest of the world. Both plans would call for a tower that would become the world's tallest, besting the Petronas Twin Towers in Malaysia by at least 200 feet. At the time of the previous towers' construction, they were the world's tallest structures. With these new designs, that title would for one more time be returned to Gotham.

Whatever is finally constructed will be debated for years. The former towers, when in the conceptual phase, were criticized by some as being behemoths on the New York City skyline. It is doubtful many felt that the towers were a mar on the horizon a few years ago. All we can do is keep an open mind and remember that the only real requirements of the new World Trade Center are a place that gives rightful honor past events, while driving towards the future.

Less than worthwhile workouts

Just yesterday I was listening to my ears. They whispered to me, "Eddie, a rumor has been swirling around that a new recreational facility will be built at UMass soon." I was skeptical and told them as much – "Ears," I said, "they've been saying such things for years. They are full of ca-ca."

But I want to believe, so I tried to convince myself. "This time is different!" I said aloud. "The situation has become too bleak! The facilities too dismal!"

I even did my research. UMass is home to 24,000 students and only has one exercise room (Boyden Weight Room #1) capable of providing a complete workout (flexibility, cardio, stabilization, reactive, and strength/power training). Did I mention that this room's max capacity is 50 people? Or that it is for varsity athletes only except for during lunch and dinner hours? Perhaps this 50-person gym is sufficient for UMass' nearly 600 athletes, but that leaves out 23,400 UMass students with cardiovascular and respiratory systems that deliver oxygen to the brain that must be maintained in order to achieve optimal academic success.

For these 23,400 students, their best option, excluding lunch and dinner hours, is Boyden Weight Room #2. Open from 1:00 p.m. to 9:00 p.m., it has a max capacity of 35 people. Exercising in Boyden Weight Room #2 is equivalent to what my imagination tells me working out in a cave is like. If it were mid-day and the cave was humid, overcrowded, and smack in the middle of the desert. Make the mistake of wearing any white clothing in Boyden Cave #2 and watch it turn brown upon contact with the weights. Sit on the black rubber jigsaw floor, and notice the dirt covering your rear end when you get up.

Eduardo Bustamante

The nauseating air in Cave #2 is hot, still, and dank. The only circulation comes from a gigantic six foot fan, which manages only to push the same dirt round and round the room. The wait for a given exercise can be upwards of half an hour. Walk in the cave and you will notice that some machines are open – don't let it fool you into thinking there's space – it's because those machines don't work. Try the Smith Machine, which is supposed to create resistance against upward movement and notice you have to push it to get it down. Don't leave anything of value on the floor or in the bins, or it won't be there when you return.

Once Boyden Cave #2 is full, there are seven Wellness and Fitness Centers on campus for the remaining 23,365 students. Sounds fancy and reassuring, huh? Well these "Centers" may as well be named "Teens-Tiny, Itsy-Bitty, Funky Fitness Rat Holes That Can't Comfortably Hold a Dozen People." If you don't believe me, walk over to any of the "Fitness Centers" and see a dozen pieces of equipment packed so tight into a 20 ft x 20 ft. cage that the machines cannot be used simultaneously without knocking into one another.

The four "Wellness Centers" are located in the dormitories. Enough students, out-of-state especially, have expressed their dissatisfaction with UMass pamphlets that condescendingly promise "Wellness Centers" in the dorms, that the title should have already been dropped. The University also includes a swift kick in the balls by charging an additional $45 a semester to use these "Wellness Centers."

Even if one is willing to endure this vicious kick and pay the ridiculous fee, all nine of these widespread facilities have individual schedules. Each opens and closes two or three times a day for one to two-hour stints, and times vary depending on the day of the week. Oh yeah, and none of them have hours that need be followed, as printed on the top of the schedule in bold letters – "Schedule is subject to change without notice!!"

There are other facilities for exercise – three swimming pools and two basketball courts, but they are also insufficient as well. The Totman basketball court is too slippery to play on. The Boyden basketball/volleyball court is huge and is currently available for an hour at noon and from 6:00-9:00pm. If you skip lunch and class and go at noon you better have carried a basketball around campus all day because they will not have a ball there for you. If you go at night there is no guarantee you will get in a game because it is so overcrowded. If you do manage to get in a game your knees will be hurting later because the floor is as hard as concrete.

The University's shortcoming is so blatant that some years back a couple observant entrepreneurs, a former UMass heard basketball coach and UMass athletic trainer, opened up a decent gym called Ultimate Fitness. Ultimate Fitness has space, a carpet, lockers, and an outrageous absence of dirt. These basic necessities, combined with a location neighboring the 24,000 cardiovascular systems marooned on the UMass campus, keep Ultimate Fitness jam-packed despite their ridiculously expensive membership fees.

To whoever is responsible for creating a "new recreational facility," if you can pull it off I will write repeated articles advocating that an oversized statue of you be built in front of our beautiful new "Wellness Center."

On flags and moments

Yousef Munayyer

Confucius once said "we cannot realize what is wrong with our society until we call things by their real names." His words ring true today.

I realized this week how numb we are to death. Over breakfast I overheard someone talking about the shuttle accident and they were wondering if anybody really cared about it. It filled our headlines, was on every station and yet people were questioning if anyone cared.

At first I thought, "sure we care," these were people just like me. Then I realized that they weren't just like me. These people were astronauts, they were on an important mission, they died at work, and that's what makes it so tragic. So I began to think about what makes it tragic. What makes the lives of these people so different than anyone else?

Well, they risked their lives everyday and wore an American flag while doing it. This makes sense. But when I think about how we "mourn" their loss as a nation, are we actually mourning? Are we actually affected? Sure we take our moments of silence, we lower our flags to half-mast; we go through all the formalities, but what's actually going through our heads, and why?

I don't think many people took time to think much about the lives of these brave astronauts. I don't think many people take time to think about the deaths of many people. So to find out why this is I posed myself with this question: Has our society grown numb to death? Suffering? Pain?

Do we really feel the same way about these seven lives as we do about the hundreds who die homeless in our streets every year? Do we feel the same about them as we do about the children around the world who die of malnutrition and starvation every night? Do we feel the same about them as the millions infected with the AIDS virus who are on a list very much like death row? I don't believe so. We have grown numb to these problems and it is sickening.

I do not think, in essence, that we value one life more than another. I think we have gradually devaluated life itself. When several casualties occur because we do not double-check our targets we call it "collateral damage." When people are forcefully made to move from their place of residence or are killed because of their race or nationality we call it "ethnic cleansing." We need to stop whitewashing death and we need to treat every situation in which a person was killed the same as the tragic loss of an astronaut.

Do we even know what a tragedy is anymore? Is it not tragic that the hungry, the sick, and the persecuted face horrible fates? Of course, but we do not put them on prime time TV. We don't want to hear about so many people being killed, it would be depressing after a while. No one wants to advertise on depressing TV programs. But yet we counter this: we drop bombs on other people, but we don't always find it depressing. We vilify our enemies in the news, in the media, in cartoons. We make people hated. We make their deaths seem ok.

> "I do not think, in essence, that we value one life more than another. I think we have gradually devaluated life itself."

Many people in our society today entertain themselves by playing video games and watching movies that showcase death, dying, and carnage as their main attractions (which I can say I am guilty of being a fan our war movies and James Bond for %64), but these are not alone to blame for our societal numbness to death.

It's been a gradual process. It could have to do with the advancement of weapons. In 1945, we killed hundreds of thousands of Japanese with two bombs, yet how often do we consider this. In 1945 a film was also shown in the United States in which the narrator told the viewer that Japanese soldiers throw Chinese babies on spikes. We vilified our enemy and numbed the pain of knowing we killed thousands of them indiscriminately.

It continued with war after war. Our nation, before both world wars was considered an isolationist state. We stayed to ourselves and cared about our own issues. Woodrow Wilson ran on the platform of keeping the nation out of war during WWI. And Roosevelt also wanted to avoid war until Pearl Harbor in 1941. Since then our stance toward war has changed. We are more willing, or so it seems to commit ourselves to war.

Americans have died in Korea, Vietnam and other parts of Indo-China, Guatemala along with other parts of Latin America, Somalia and other places as well. Since WWII it can be argued that we never ceased war. There was constant fighting and constant death, not even to mention the threat of nuclear annihilation that was constant throughout the cold war.

Even now the current administration is pushing to go to war that has not been provoked by an attack. Before such a decision is made, we have to think about the lives we are about to put at risk. We need to think about the moments of silence we are going to have. And we need to think about the boxes covered in flags that will cause mourning.

And I'm not talking about American flags only.

Reality check: My friend is going to war

Until about 20 minutes ago, the war with the Middle East meant nothing to me. It was a news clip, an AOL hyperlink. However, my friend Brett recently informed me that my friend Adam, who is an Army reservist, is going to war. On Tuesday he finds out where he's going and when. However, he won't know when he's coming back. I'm going home this weekend to see him because this could be the last time I will ever see him.

As out of this world scary as that is, it is the reality. He isn't going to work at the car shop like he does every other day. He's going to war. He's probably going to Afghanistan, and will probably be there until the war is over. I guess they always have reserves over there just in case.

Matthew Elder

My friend is going to war. The person I've drank with, raced my car against, and shared many moments of my life with, will be in the Middle East in a week or so. My friend is going to war. That has to be a line out of a book. It can't be about me, right? I'm a college kid, nothing bad can happen to me or anyone around me. That line, "my friend is going to war," sounds like something out of my high school Social Studies book, or a piece of literature I read about Vietnam. However, I need to come to the reality that it is true.

The weird thing is, I'm not the only one who's being affected like this. After I found out, I had to tell some of my friends at school what was happening. A lot of people said things like, "my cousin was sent out last week." or "my friend is already gone," and I was shocked! I remember the stories that my mom, dad and teachers all told me about Vietnam. As I thought about this, I realized for the second time in my life I was actually living out history.

After September 11, one thing I came to realize was that it would be in our grandchildren's history books. History is for our parents and grandparents, but not for us. We don't live history; we just live our lives. Will these next few months and years be in history books 50 years from now? If it is, I will be able to recite stories to my grandchildren just like I've heard people tell stories to me.

I didn't think anything of the war until now. I barely know who we are fighting against. All I know is we're fighting terror. I guess now

Adam is fighting terror. Adam is fighting to save my life and the lives of my children, and the lives of their children.

When Adam originally went to the reserves he was like, "the only way anything will happen is if we go to war." This was months before September 11. Months before the words "bin Laden," "small pox" and "bioterrorism" were dinner discussions. Now that it is, I have so much respect for him because he is fighting for all of us.

I've seen movies where people meet up with friends before one of them goes to war. They always have a big group hug and it's a really emotional goodbye. It will be real surreal as my group of friends and myself hug Adam. All I can do is pray it won't be for the last time.

Daredevil: The Man Without Fear - An Introduction

By ERIK TAYLOR
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Daredevil stands out among Marvel's explosion of modern superheroes from the early '60s. Despite being blinded by a radioactive isotope during a childhood accident, Matt Murdock's remaining senses were enhanced to a superhuman level. He can hear the heartbeat of a frightened victim a block away, catch a criminal's scent while investigating a crime scene, and feel a room expanding caused by a person's breathing. All of these enhanced senses have given him something better than sight, a radar-sense, which he uses to protect the citizens of the Hell's Kitchen section of New York City as Daredevil: The Man Without Fear.

Matt Murdock is a lawyer by day and vigilante at night, working the system for his crusade for justice. His partner and confidant Foggy Nelson has been Matt's loyal friend since college and knows the Matt Murdock/Daredevil secret. His mother Sister Maggie is a nun at the Clinton Mission Center in the Kitchen who has acted as Matt's spiritual mentor throughout most of his life. Daily Bugle reporter Ben Urich also knows of Matt Murdock's alter ego and works with him by using his connections with the newspaper.

In 1998, Marvel decided to start fresh with their popular blind hero under their Marvel Knights imprint. With writer Kevin Smith (writer and director of "Clerks," "Mallrats" and the upcoming "Jersey Girl") and dynamic artist Joe Quesada (now Marvel's editor in chief), Daredevil was given a chance to shine. With Smith providing his story with ear-grabbing dialogue and Quesada providing amazing art, they crafted a Daredevil story that made the character a little darker and a lot more driven. Both artist and writer contributions to the comic are used as influences in the upcoming "Daredevil" film (Feb. 14).

Now Brian Michael Bendis ("Ultimate Spider-Man", "Alias") lends his usual character driven plots and tense rapid fire dialogue to "Daredevil." Over the recent years, "Daredevil" has become more street level crime-fiction than superhero fare. The art is darker and more subdued, mostly provided by the talented Alex Maleev, and Hell's Kitchen seems more of a place for drug pushers and mobsters than supervillains. With the Kingpin of Crime finally gone from New York, his criminal empire is up for grabs. In the recent story arcs "Underboss" and "Out," Daredevil deals with everyone who wishes to take the Kingpin's mantle as crime boss. In an effort to save his own skin, one of these hopeful scumbags divulges the secret of Daredevil's identity to the FBI and eventually the media, making it front page news. This daring move by writer Bendis has catapulted Daredevil to dangerous new territory, a superhero whose secret identity is the hottest scandal in the media.

Now, with the "Daredevil" feature film approaching, last month's "Daredevil" #41 dropped its usual cover price to 25 cents. The issue was a good jumping on point for new readers and kicked off a new five-part story line called "Lowlife," which Bendis hopes will again

Will the movie live up to the comic?

By ERIK TAYLOR
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Marvel Comics bring its first icon, since Spider-Man, to the big screen on Feb. 14: "Daredevil." It will be tough to follow the example led by the "Spider-Man" movie. Daredevil isn't an instantly recognizable character like Batman, Superman and Spider-Man, which is a challenge for the film. Also the film acts like a buffer of comic book films, placed between the success of Spider-Man and the anticipation of summer's "X-Men 2" and "The Hulk." The cast and crew, however, are optimistic that their loyal and honest adaptation should give Daredevil the spotlight he has long deserved.

Director Mark Steven Johnson has been a Daredevil fan ever since he was a child, as was Ben Affleck. Back in 2001, Ben Affleck wrote the introduction to Kevin Smith's "Daredevil: Visionaries" trade paperback explaining his connection to the character. Jennifer Garner's intense physical role in ABC's "Alias" prepared her for her role as the assassin Elektra Natchios. Michael Clark Duncan's enormous size made him the ideal choice for the role of Kingpin of Crime. Finally the intense acting style of Colin Farrell brings Kingpin's assassin Bullseye to life. With all of the pieces fitting together, Johnson will finally bring his childhood hero to the movies.

Now it is obvious that the world of comics and the worlds of television and film are different. What works in the comics, epic battle scenes and colorful costumes etc., doesn't necessarily translate well to film. For that reason there has to be some changes to accommodate these differences. One of the biggest changes is the Kingpin being black. In the comics Wilson Fiske is a very large and imposing white guy. Due to Duncan's size and screen presence, the fact he was black was ignored in casting him as Kingpin. Bullseye doesn't wear the costume he wears in the comics; a bullseye scar on the character's baldhead replaces the bullseye on the headpiece of the costume. And unfortunately for the male audience, Elektra's practical black leather outfit replaces her traditional skimpy silky red garb. Despite these necessary changes, the film will remain true to the core of Daredevil and essence of his world.

One of the main challenges facing the filmmakers was how to bring Daredevil's radar sense to the big screen. Special effects house "Rhythm & Hues" will bring Daredevil's special abilities to life. In one scene, Matt and Elektra are standing on the roof of a building as it begins to rain. By using his enhanced senses, he can "see" what she looks like by sensing the raindrops hitting her face. The visuals used to display Daredevil's radar sense are truly breathtaking.

The romance in the film is very essential to the story because it gives Matt something else in his life besides vengeance as Daredevil. The problem is, Elektra believes that Daredevil was responsible for the death of her father, making her Daredevil's enemy while remaining Matt Murdock's love interest. With this mixed up and touching love story, its release on Valentine's Day does seem fitting.

With all of these aspects combined and the crew's affection towards the material, 20th Century Fox are bound to have a hit on their hands. It probably won't see "Spider-Man"-like success but it will be a success nonetheless.

The world of Daredevil

Even with the financial and critical success of the main "Daredevil" comic series, there are other series and trade paperbacks (affordable collections of popular story-arcs) for people interested in other aspects of the Daredevil mythos. As these collections of stories show, Daredevil's dealings with women have become the epitome of tragic relationships, and his enemies have proven to be more deadly than ever before.

'DAREDEVIL VISIONARIES: FRANK MILLER VOL..2'
WRITER/ARTIST: FRANK MILLER

"It was a dark corner, a place where my sympathies were uncertain. (Am I the only guy who occasionally rooted for Bullseye?) It was a strange and wonderful place where true love was always tragic, heroes had a dark side, villains were roguishly likeable and the best one could hope for was some sliver of redemption."

Ben Affleck included this in his introduction to "Daredevil Visionaries: Kevin Smith" trade paperback in 2001 (before the "Daredevil" film was even considered) about his affection for this tormented Superhero. The series of comics collected in Frank Miller's trade paperback contains the original story of Daredevil, Elektra, Kingpin and Bullseye – much of it translated into this February's film. Still 20 years later, this is considered to be the definitive collection of Daredevil.

'DAREDEVIL VISIONARIES: KEVIN SMITH'
WRITER: KEVIN SMITH
ARTIST: JOE QUESADA

This Trade Paperback collects the comics that resurrected the popularity of Daredevil in the late 90s. Writer Kevin Smith gives us his spitfire dialogue and twisting plots in "Guardian Devil," the storyline that changes Daredevil's world forever. A mysterious threat looms over Daredevil as he comes across an infant – one he must protect from the evil that surrounds them both. Karen Page enters once again into Matt Murdock's life as well as Bullseye. Mysterio and many other Marvel characters. Daredevil is pushed to his limits and begins to wonder if the life of the baby worth all this torment.

Daredevil vs. Spiderman

By ERIK TAYLOR
COLLEGIAN STAFF

They are both New York City's premiere Superheroes and now are both huge movie properties. The first reaction of people will be to compare the two characters but, while they do share some similarities, they are assuredly very different characters.

SIMILARITIES:

Both reside in New York City.

Stan Lee created both in the early '60s, making them Marvel properties.

Both characters' superpowers resulted from a radioactive accident.

Both have enhanced senses: Spider-Man's spidey sense and Daredevil's radar sense.

They both have extremely disheveled personal lives.

In the comics, the two have teamed up numerous times – a partnership that won't appear in the movies.

Both wear red.

DIFFERENCES:

Peter Parker/Spider-Man is currently a high school science teacher: Matt Murdock/Daredevil is a lawyer.

Daredevil is pushed to vengeance by the loss of his father, while Spider-Man avenges his Uncle's death.

Daredevil's arch-nemesis is crime lord Kingpin; Spider-Man's is the unstable Green Goblin.

Peter Parker is married to Mary Jane; Matt Murdock's girlfriends leave him or get killed before marriage becomes an issue.

Spider-Man swings on webs, while Daredevil uses modified billy clubs.

Spider-Man is bright, swinging high in the sky; Daredevil is dark, roaming the dark rooftops and shadowed alleyways.

Spider-Man's movie cost $139 million; Daredevil's was $75 million.

Spider-Man can see; Daredevil can't.

Game Four; Round One

A popular Hollywood myth states that Kevin Bacon is somehow connected to every other actor in show business by no more than six degrees – where a degree is a single link between the given movie star and someone else who has appeared on-screen with him/her. Rumor states that every puzzle has at least one solution.

IMPROV auditions Sunday

Mission IMPROVable, the University of Massachusetts' popular improv comedy troupe, will hold auditions for new members Sunday in the Campus Center, Room 163 at 5 and 7:30 p.m. The audition is open to anyone, regardless of prior experience in theater or improv comedy.

Performing weekly shows at UMass for the last seven years, Mission IMPROVable has earned a devoted fan-base and continues to draw in new viewers during their Saturday night shows in the Campus Center basement. Their shows, which begin at 8 p.m. and are free of charge, combine music, improv games, and crowd suggestions to create an unpredictable blend of comedy in the vein of "Whose Line is it Anyway."

The performing troupe grew out of a Student Valley Productions Improv Troupe created in 1991. In 1994, several theater students sparked the creation of Mission IMPROVable as it is known today. The troupe consists of more than a dozen UMass students, some of which perform in other campus theater organizations as well.

Some former members of Mission IMPROVable now perform improvisation comedy on the professional circuit. Mission IMPROV alumni such as Aaron Krebs and Jason Reb (1998-98 cast), currently tour the United States and perform professionally for Mission IMPROVable Chicago.

On Feb. 20, Mission IMPROVable will open for Frank Santos, The Xrated Hypnotist, at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at 8 p.m.

Questions about auditions for Mission IMPROVable can be directed to rdick@student.umass.edu.

Dead Prez dig themselves into a hole

By Justin Chellman
Collegian Staff

Now that school is in full swing, local venues are bustling with plenty of shows to entertain the masses. The Lyricist Lounge Tour, no stranger to the area, returned to the Five College area during fall semester to give a talk on diversity and the black experience in America. Last time the tour came around, the Boot Camp Clik headlined it, and when it returns next month pioneer Big Daddy Kane will headline it. In this installment Atlanta natives the Young Bloods and Killer Mike joined the controversial revolutionists, Dead Prez. Consisting of the two emcees, Stic and M1, Dead Prez have gained much popularity with true hip hop heads and activists since their widely acclaimed debut release "Let's Get Free."

Dead Prez and guests Killer Mike, The Young Bloods
'The Lyricist Lounge Tour'

A decent crowd turned out for the show on a cold Monday night. The show took its time getting started, as is usually the case at hip-hop shows. Eventually, we were treated to well-rocked sets from the unconventional hip-hop that has become associated with the Atlanta style. Very lively songs with strong choruses from the Young Bloods, who like their ATL peers were very talented at adding harmony and southern flavor to their club-bumping style. Killer Mike, who went after them, continued that feeling, as well as adding a little more street rap as opposed to the pimped out style of the Young Bloods.

Sandwiched between the opening acts and Dead Prez, there was an impromptu emcee freestyle battle, where emcees were invited on stage to battle. The first emcee ripped it well with a fast high tone hardcore style that impressed the crowd, but he was followed by a fur lined coat-wearing tokimy white kid emcee who awkwardly put lame rhymes together with a weak voice and no confidence; he was booed off stage. He was followed by a female emcee that didn't do much better as she tried to talk about the government in a wavering style that had the crowd unconvinced. Finally, another emcee came on and dropped a terrific flow. They then took a vote for best emcee through crowd response. The first emcee won hands down, which left the last contestant unhappy as he gave the crowd a middle finger and proceeded to the back of the club.

Next, Dead Prez came to the stage and began rocking it and they definitely showed how a real emcee differs in talent from the free stylists that were on the stage just minutes before. The sound was bumping, but unfortunately I got the impression that M1 and Stic didn't want to be there. The only songs that I recall them rocking all the was through were "Mind Sex" and "They Schools." Wonderful as those songs were, I was definitely disappointed: I came there to see Dead Prez as I assume did the other people who were at the show, and Killer Mike and the Young Bloods played longer, more fulfilling sets. Dead Prez still had a lot to say though, as they told the crowd the "Code of the Warrior" which is the rules they live by and hope the community will live by as well. M1 also burnt a miniature U.S. flag onstage and talked about the school system and George W. Bush.

The last time the tour came through, Boot Camp Clik headlined it, and they also had people open for them, yet they still killed it and played all their beloved favorites for the crowd. I don't see why it couldn't have been the same for Dead Prez; maybe Boot Camp Clik is just hungrier than Dead Prez. Whatever the case may be, I hope that future shows from the Lyricist Lounge will be more like the show from Boot Camp and not like this one because, Dead Prez didn't even do an encore. Maybe they weren't feeling the crowd, but since the emcee is in charge of moving the crowd, if the crowd isn't hyped, who is to blame?

Spider-Man in "Spider-Man: Blue," and the upcoming "Hulk: Gray." The dated art by Tim Sale fits the '60s era setting perfectly and Ieph Loeb's ("Smallville") talent for fleshing out origins make for a nice addition to the Daredevil mythos. Their approach to "Daredevil: Yellow" was to go into his past, when Matt Murdock became Daredevil, and views this transformation in accordance to falling in love with Karen Page. The story is told from Matt Murdock's point of view, as the Man Without Fear is afraid to live in a world without her.

'DAREDEVIL: THE TARGET'
WRITER: KEVIN SMITH
ARTIST: GLENN FABRY

After Bullseye robbed Daredevil of his most beloved in Kevin Smith's "Guardian Devil" storyline, the murderer disappeared. Years later, Kevin Smith returns to this "Daredevil" mini-series to pit Daredevil against the homicidal Bullseye. The killer returns to New York City a little crazier than when he left and plans to make more hell for Daredevil. In the first issue to prove his return, Bullseye launches a toothpick into a woman's head while she cradles her baby, reminding us that he really is the biggest psychopath in comics. This mini-series is currently on sale.

'ELEKTRA'
WRITER: GREG RUCKA
ARTIST: CARLO PAGULAYAN

Her life is shrouded in mystery as Marvel's premiere assassin for hire thrives in a world full of potential clients and targets. This Marvel Knights ongoing series currently focuses on Elektra seeking redemption for the hundreds of men and women she has killed. She is quickly learning that the road back from darkness is a long and un-forgiving one as she trains her body and soul to rid herself of the violence shrouding her life. Her old masters, a deadly clan of ninja assassins known as The Hand, are looking to reclaim their old asset. They are chosen her heels, leaving nothing but blood-bed in their path, leaving Elektra to eventually confront her evil past.

'ULTIMATE DAREDEVIL & ELEKTRA'
WRITER: GREG RUCKA
ARTIST: SALVADOR LARROCA

Marvel's Ultimate Universe takes place continuity outside of the original Marvel Universe, giving creators the freedom to update and interperate the mythos of their most popular characters for new readers. In this retelling of the Elektra and Daredevil relationship, Elektra arrives at Columbia University full of excitement and optimism about her college career. She meets and falls in love with a young Matt Murdock, a blind law student who is more than he appears. Elektra is soon confronted by the harsh realities of the world and is forced to make some tough decisions – ones that could take her down a road of darkness and solitude.

'El Titan' arrives; Contreras lands in NY

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK – Jose Contreras has a nickname as sharp as his pitches: "El Titan de Bronze."

And, he says, it was given to him by Fidel Castro.

Contreras finally made it to Yankee Stadium on Thursday to finalize his $52 million, four-year contract.

At his introductory news conference, Contreras said the Cuban president called him "the Titan of Bronze" because the right-hander was the "Cuban ace." The nickname originally belonged to Antonio Maceo, the general who led the Cuban liberation army against Spain in the 19th century.

Contreras, however, wouldn't say what he thinks about Castro, whose communist regime has caused many Cuban baseball stars to defect, leaving their families behind.

"I can talk about Cuba. I can talk about Cuban baseball," Contreras said through a translator. "But I'm not here as a politician to talk about politics."

Dressed in a double-breasted blue-gray suit, the 6-foot-4 right-hander spoke softly about his departure from Cuba last fall and his hopes to make his mark in the major leagues.

His model is Roger Clemens, one of his new teammates in pinstripes. Will the Titan pitch inside, just like the Rocket?

"Si, si, si," Contreras said, words that agent Jaime Torres didn't need to translate.

"That's the difference for a pitcher," Contreras said. "That's how a pitcher lives, pitching inside."

Asked what he admired in Clemens, Contreras cited "great, incredible physical condition and abilities," "pitching strategy" and "guts and bravado."

Contreras, who has a burly chest and tree-trunk legs, will get to start showing his stuff next week, when the Yankees open spring training in Tampa, Fla. He'll be scrutinized along with the team's other new foreign acquisition, outfielder Hideki "Godzilla" Matsui.

"These people have been superstars in their respective leagues," said Yankees manager Joe Torre, looking tan following a six-week vacation in Maui. "I'm curious. I really am. They're both going to need interpreters. But I bet they understand each other."

Contreras did not quite get the welcome given Matsui, a three-time MVP in Japan. When Matsui was introduced Jan. 14, the Yankees held a news conference at a Times Square hotel, and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg was the official greeter.

Thursday's fiesta was held in the Stadium Club of Yankee Stadium, and Bronx Borough President Adolfo Carrion Jr. welcomed him "on behalf of all New Yorkers and 1.4 million residents of the Bronx, many of Latino descent."

Yankees owner George Steinbrenner allowed Contreras to use a private plane to travel to New York from Florida on Wednesday, and briefly came aboard to meet his latest acquisition for the first time.

Contreras left the Cuban team in October while it was playing in Mexico. He didn't tell his teammates his plans, nor did he tell his two daughters, aged two and 10, according to the Yankees.

Once he established residency in Nicaragua and became a free agent, the Yankees won quickly in bidding that also included Boston and Seattle.

"Since I left Cuba, my dream was to be a Yankee," Contreras said.

New York general manager Brian Cashman likes Contreras for his 95 mph fastball, tough split-finger pitch and slider.

The Yankees had been tracking Contreras at tournaments since 1996 and decided after his standout performance in the 2000 Sydney Olympics that they would try to sign him if he ever became available.

Contreras knows he might not even start because the Yankees have seven candidates for their rotation heading to spring training.

"I've always been a starter, and I would prefer to remain a starter," he said. "But I'm willing and ready to do anything the Yankees ask me to do. I'm the last one to arrive. I understand that."

Rivals UMass, Temple square off

And point guard Anthony Anderson, who garnered high expectations after averaging 10 ppg en route to Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year honors, has struggled to find a rhythm.

He's averaging 10 ppg, good for second on the team, but the normally accurate 3-point shooter has seen ebbs and flows in his touch.

That doesn't bode well for tomorrow's game.

"Coming in it doesn't look like a great matchup for us," Lappas said. "Historically, you need to make three point shots against Temple. And right now we're not making them. But we're going to shoot threes. I don't want to take thirty of them but we're going to shoot them."

The Minutemen's ability to hit the open three could play a large role in the outcome.

A hot-shooting team can spread out Temple's vaunted matchup zone. But on a cold team, as UMass has been recently, allows the Owls to collapse down on the frontline and crowd the lane.

That will make it difficult for slashing players like Viggiano, Lasme and Raheim Lamb to get quality looks at the basket from in close.

Lappas believes that the Minutemen's shooting woes can be attributed to confidence.

"There's no doubt I'm worried about it," he said. "The question is what do you do about it? Right now I'm just telling the guys to relax and go have fun."

St. Bona next for women

22-point drubbing handed to them by UMass, the Bonnies have compiled just a 2-7 record in Atlantic 10 play, with Fordham and La Salle being St. Bona's only victims. The Brown and Gold have also lost 16 of their last 18 games, and boast the worst overall record of any team in the A-10.

If a silver lining does exist for coach Jim Crowley's squad, it would have to be that both of their conference wins and four of their five overall wins have come inside the friendly confines of the Reilly Center, where this weekend's game will be held. And with A-10 powerhouse George Washington looming on the horizon, Sunday's tilt can most certainly be labeled a "trap" game. However if the Minutewomen are headed for a letdown, it will not be because of Dacko.

"There's no false sense of security here," Dacko said. "We've played against the best that's out there on the road, and I tell them all the time we need to come to play every game. It's about focus and intensity and running the floor. If we do all of those we'll be fine, and I just tell them that over and over to make sure it's drilled in their heads."

In addition to GW, the Maroon and White will also face St. Joseph's in the span of one week following Sunday's game, so the importance of picking up a win they should earn is evident before tough tests against the A-10's West and East champions, respectively.

"We [need] to take the ones we should take," Butler said. "But more importantly we [need] to take it one game at a time and worry about things as they happen."

"We know what's out there," Dacko said. "But we have to concentrate on winning the games at hand, because that's what's important for us at the moment."

Gerald R. Lima/Collegian

Nekole Smith scored her 1,000th career point in the Minutewomen's last game with St. Bonaventure on Jan. 18. UMass won that contest 70-48.

Two teams, different directions

Struggling men take on Temple

By MATTHEW F. SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The teams have a combined 14-25 record. Both are in the midst of rebuilding years and neither are within a half court heave of the top 25 or an NCAA Tournament berth. But it's still UMass vs. Temple.

That's why ESPN will broadcast the game as part of rivalry week tomorrow at noon.

And despite a discouraging 71-43 loss to Tennessee on Wednesday, UMass coach Steve Lappas expects a big crowd and his team to be motivated.

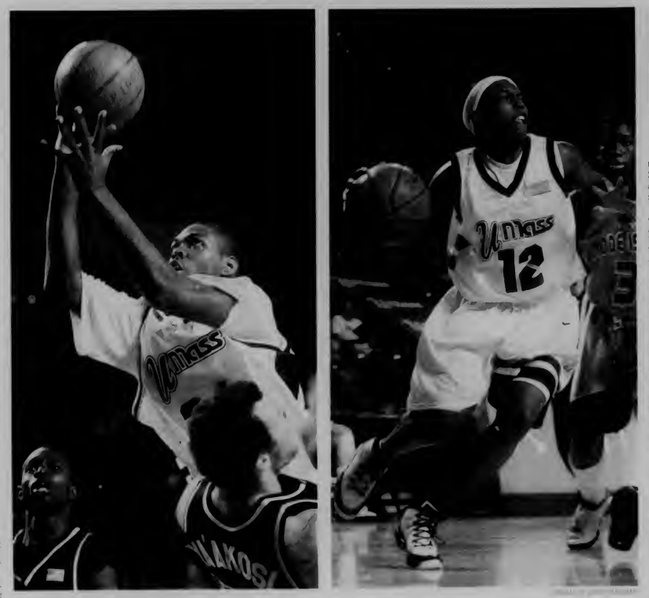
"I hope they're looking forward to it," Lappas said. "I think the kids will be excited to play."

The Minutemen are in one of their toughest losing stretches of the season, having lost six of the last eight.

But Lappas doesn't think that will deter any of the excitement.

He's been preaching youth and future success all year, and tomorrow will give the Mullins Center crowd a glimpse into the program's potential.

Freshmen Gabe Lee, Mike Lasme and Jeff Viggiano have shown flashes of brilliance, including a 24-point outing from Lasme against George Washington and a 12-point, nine rebound effort by Lee in a loss to Dayton.



"I'm very pleased [with Gabe], he's done a great job," Lappas said. "We need to get all three of them playing well at the same time. But they need help, they're not going to do it themselves."

As of late, all they've had is inconsistency.

While still struggling with an ankle injury, senior captain Micah Brand has missed two of the last seven games and only scored in double digits once.

Brand's frontcourt mate, Jackie Rogers, who leads the team with 13 ppg is averaging under eight in his last four starts.

Rising women head to Olean

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to make it two wins in a row this Sunday as they travel to Olean, New York for a clash with a struggling St. Bonaventure squad.

The Minutewomen will once again be without point guard Katie Nelson. However, after a poor performance in their first test without her against Rhode Island at home last Thursday night, coach Marnie Ducko's troops were able to right the ship with a convincing performance against La Salle on Sunday afternoon.

Ducko hopes that the tenacity and hard-nosed play her team exuded against the Explorers will carry over into Sunday's matchup.

"We need to play with [a high level] of intensity all the time," Ducko said. "Sometimes we can get away with a little bit of complacency because of our talent, but we don't want that at all. And with Katie out we can't afford to let up because we need everyone to perform in order to pick up the slack."

UMass will enter the game somewhat familiar with the Bonnies, having defeated them just over three weeks ago at the Mullins Center 70-48. It was in that game that senior co-captain Nekole Smith recorded her 1,000th point for the Minutewomen. This time around, however, there will be no individual focus on any player.

"We all just [have to] step up," fellow senior co-captain Jen Butler said. "With [Katie] out we need everyone to chip in, not just one person."

"It's important that everyone does what they can to help us out," Ducko added. "This is obviously a team game and we need the whole team to help us be successful."

St. Bonaventure enters play stumbling through a horrid campaign. In addition to the Successful surgery for Calhoun

FARMINGTON, Conn.- Connecticut basketball coach Jim Calhoun had surgery to remove his cancerous prostate Thursday, and a full recovery is expected.

The 60-year-old coach will be released from the hospital this weekend and will be able to resume coaching in three to four weeks, Dr. Peter Albertsen said.

Albertsen, Calhoun's urologist, said there were no problems during surgery at John Dempsey Hospital.

"By acting this early, the likelihood the tumor will be confined to the prostate is extremely high," Albertsen said.

He estimated there was a 98 percent chance the cancer would not return.

The coach was diagnosed with cancer Friday. Albertsen said Calhoun's prostate test results were only slightly higher than normal, but the coach did not want to wait until the end of the season for surgery.

Following the 2 1/2-hour surgery, Calhoun and his family gathered in his hospital room, where they answered calls from well-wishers around the country.

"Every player who played for him has been calling," his son Jim Calhoun Jr. said.

Before surgery Wednesday night, Calhoun and his family watched on television as the 18th-ranked Huskies (13-5, 4-3 Big East) lost 68-74 at Virginia Tech. The loss, not the upcoming surgery, weighed heaviest on his mind.

"I'm surprised we still have a TV," left Calhoun said.

Calhoun is in his 17th season at Connecticut. His assistant, George Blaney, is coaching the team in his absence.

Calhoun will be able to leave his hospital bed Friday and should be able to walk around the house this weekend, Albertsen said.

He was not prescribed any medication Thursday, and Albertsen said he expects Calhoun will require only moderate pain medicine during recovery.

"He's a pretty tough guy," said Albertsen, whose prostate research has been published in the Journal of the American Medical Association. "He's going to bounce back quickly."

Calhoun has led the Huskies to national prominence, capped by an NCAA title in 1999. With a career record of 637-280, including 14 seasons at Northeastern, he is among the top 10 active Division I coaches with at least 600 career wins.

Epstein looking forward to first full spring training as Sox GM

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

BOSTON – Theo Epstein knows spring training will be more stable for the Boston Red Sox than last year's hectic mixture of firings, hirings and ownership change.

When pitchers and catchers report to Fort Myers, Fla., on Feb. 14, John Henry will have had a full season as owner and there will be no question about who will run the team in the front office and on the field.

"It's remarkable to think that you can change ownership, general manager and manager during the same spring training and get off to as good a start as we did last year," Epstein said. "There's no doubt that there's much more stability this year."

Boston was 40-17 on June 6 and led the AL East by 3 1/2 games but ended up missing the playoffs.

Epstein, the general manager for less than three months, wasn't with the Red Sox when spring training began last year.

He wasn't there when all the changes began on Feb. 27 – nearly two weeks after camp opened – when the deal was closed making Henry the principal owner.

And he wasn't there Feb. 28 when general manager Dan Duquette was fired, March 5 when manager Joe Kerrigan was fired or March 11 when Grady Little became manager.

At the time, Epstein was "enjoying myself in Phoenix" near the camp for the San Diego Padres, where he was director of baseball operations. He also was pushing the Padres to let him talk with the Red Sox.

He finally got the OK and joined them March 29 at an exhibition game in Houston as assistant general manager.

"I was in limbo because my hometown team had asked to interview me for the assistant general manager job and permission had been denied," he said.

Mike Port served as interim general manager last season and, after a long search, Epstein became the youngest general manager in baseball on Nov. 25. He turned 29 in December. Port is one of his assistants.

Epstein has been very active and plans to arrive at spring training Wednesday to watch a team that already bears his imprint with many new players.

"I never imagined this," he said.

Once in Fort Myers, he expects to shorten his workday since most of his personnel moves have been completed.

"Spring training is probably the time of year that we'll have a chance to relax a bit at night," he said. "Not a lot goes on at night in spring training."

When spring training began last year the safe wasn't complete, so owners Henry, Tom Werner and Larry Lucchino tiptoed around camp keeping a low profile. Duquette showed up occasionally and said he expected to stay with the team. Kerrigan said he didn't worry about his future.

By the time the new owners, general manager and manager were in place, there were just three weeks left in spring training. When Epstein showed up in Houston three days before the regular season, there was no one to show him around.

All of a sudden, it was Day One as a Red Sox employee. I walked around the clubhouse and introduced myself," he said. "It wasn't necessarily awkward. I was excited in my first day on the job."

Why not?

Epstein grew up as a Red Sox fan near Fenway Park and enjoyed keeping tabs on spring training as a child even though he never saw it in person.

"I remember listening to the games on the radio and hearing some kid in Double-A playing with the big-league team and hitting a home run," he said. "I thought maybe this kid will break through and become rookie of the year and, of course, he went back to Double-A."

In his seven years with the Padres, "it was always special, the first day of spring training," he said. "The players put on their uniforms and you'd see how the team would take shape.

"This spring is going to be more special because it's a Red Sox uniform they'll be pulling on."

Anti-stalking campaign set for today

By FERRON SALNIKER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In an effort to raise awareness of issues concerning stalking and violence against women, the Everywoman's Center in coalition with staff from Safe Passage, a battered woman's shelter, will coordinate the "Loves Me Not" anti-stalking campaign today.

The event takes place from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the University of Massachusetts campus center concourse and in Northampton.

Staff from both organizations will distribute daisies with information attached to them about stalking, its prevalence, and what resources are available to victims of stalking. A table in the Campus Center Concourse will have additional information available.

The Everywoman's Center and Safe Passage are also collaborating with libraries and bookstores in Amherst and Northampton. The UMass Textbook Annex, the W.E.B. Dubois Library, Food for Thought Books, Atticus Bookshop, Jeffery Amherst Bookshop and Beyond Words Bookshop will all distribute bookmarks with information about stalking during the month of February.

According to the United States Department of Justice, each year an estimated 1,006,970 women and 370,992 men are stalked in the United States.

Sixty percent of female victims and 30 percent of male victims are stalked by an intimate partner, according to the Department of Justice. One in 12 women and one in 45 men will be stalked in their lifetime.

The Everywoman's Center is a campus-based women's center that provides leadership in promoting educational access and equity for women.

The center's mission is to empower women to take full control of their lives and strengthen the connections among women. The center sponsors five different programs and two projects designed to serve the needs of the UMass and surrounding community.

Another campaign sponsored by the Everywoman's Center is the "Got Consent?" poster campaign, designed to raise awareness of sexual assault.

Safe Passage, a center for battered women and their children in Northampton, offers counseling and transitional housing for battered women. The center also offers assistance with finding permanent housing and work, parenting support and education, and a 24-hour hotline.

A legal referral program also assists victims of domestic violence to locate an attorney. The center recently celebrated their 25th year of creating solutions and support for battered women.

For more information or ways to get involved with the "Loves Me Not" anti-stalking campaign, contact Nicole Manganelli from the Everywoman's Center at 545-2586.

Fire leaves two families homeless

JAMES M. HAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Amherst Fire Department firefighters shovel debris in the backyard of two apartments of the North Village family housing section of the University of Massachusetts. The blaze gutted both apartments. No one was hurt.

By DAN LAMOTHE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two families in the North Village family housing section of the University of Massachusetts were left homeless last night after an electrical fire that started with a bathroom exhaust fan gutted a duplex building.

No one was hurt in the blaze, which destroyed apartments 113 and 114 in the complex. Damage to the building was estimated at $70,000 by the Amherst Fire Department.

"I was doing laundry," resident Cristian Blanco said. "I got home and my wife said that she heard a noise like something falling."

Blanco, a graduate student from Colombia in the Chemistry Department, said that he started looking around the apartment to see what the noise was it was.

"Smoke was coming from the bathroom," he said. "My wife passed me a fire extinguisher and I tried to put it out."

Blanco said that when he realized how serious the fire was, he retreated and called the police.

"I saw flames coming from the ventilation system," he said. "I realized how big it could be."

The Amherst Fire Department responded to the scene after a call by Blanco at 4:59 p.m. and reported that fire had advanced in a number of places in the building, including in the walls and in between the building's original roof and a newer roof installed on top during the late 1980's. Both roofs were removed during the extinguishing of the blaze using, among other things, a chain saw.

Fifty firefighters responded to the blaze and the work thereafter, with the Belchertown Fire Department assisting on the scene. The aftermath of the fire left a gaping 15-foot wide hole in the front side of the roof and a smaller hole in the back of the building's roof. The backyard of the duplex was littered with debris of all kind, including a refrigerator on its side, as fire fighters shoveled out the apartments.

The clean up from the blaze lasted until after 11:30 p.m, with custody of the building returned to UMass Housing Services at 11:40 p.m. Four pump trucks, an aerial ladder, four squads and two ambulances were dispatched to the scene.

Jorge Gomez, Family Housing manager, said that both of the displaced families had accommodations for last night in the Campus Center Hotel.

Blanco said that he would be staying with some friends for the night.

"Tomorrow we're going to try and relocate them," Gomez said.

The blaze affected the next duplex over, with fire fighting officials shutting the heat and electricity to apartments 115 and 116 off until the situation was under control. He said that he planned to stay last night until everything was done and everyone had a place to go.

North Village is a 240-apartment complex located on N. Pleasant Street near Puffton Village. UMass gives priority for family housing apartments there to graduate and undergraduate students who have legal dependent children living with them. Disabled students are given priority for handicapped accessible apartments. Faculty and staff are eligible on a space-available basis.

Gomez said that he has been at North Village for 14 years and has no memory of a fire bigger than yesterday's.

"We had one several years ago in a trash containment unit, but nothing [this] big," he said.

The fire department confirmed that the probable cause of the fire was a bathroom ceiling fan, but an investigation led by State Trooper Frank Hart including the Fire Marshall's Office, Amherst Fire investigators and UMPD was scheduled for this morning.

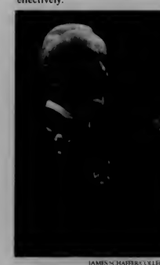
Chancellor stresses teaching and research



Lombardi inaugurated as twenty-seventh leader

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As John V. Lombardi was inaugurated Friday as 27th chancellor of the University of Massachusetts, he focused on a week-long theme, stressing the importance of the "Academic Imperative."

"We who live and build America's research universities belong to one of the longest and most stable traditions of Western civilization," Lombardi said. "Although the content of research university life has changed over the centuries, its academic imperative remains focused on students, faculty, and the pursuit of understanding."

Lombardi defined the imperative's goal saying, "Before we can do anything else, before we can reach for grand designs and society-changing influence, we must teach our students well and do our research effectively."

JAMES M. HAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Chancellor John V. Lombardi addresses the Mullins Center crowd during the inauguration ceremony held Friday.

A massive effort to raise the type of money that "buys universities the opportunity to create quality," would be crucial to the success of the campus within the University system, "although money by itself does not necessarily produce quality," he said.

Lombardi said that the funding the campus needs to attract the best faculty, workers, researchers and students must come from grants, contracts, entrepreneurial ventures, and major gifts from alumni and friends so the campus need not be as reliant on the state's funding – as it now is.

"Together [state funding and student's contribution through fees and tuition], their contribution could support a good undergraduate institution with some popular graduate programs and a modest portfolio of research," Lombardi said. However, he went on to explain the difference between a good undergraduate institution and a great national research university.

"The distinction of a national research university, however, comes from an additional investment made by alumni and friends through gifts, by the faculty and staff through grants and contracts, by entrepreneurs through the commercialization of intellectual property, and by external programs that create a surplus for reinvestment."

Lombardi said that "more money, spent well" will be critical to maintaining a competitive nature within the world of higher academics. This includes, for Lombardi, spending money to keep and draw the high caliber faculty and students to campus. Lombardi said that donations will come if UMass builds the reputation of achievement.

"When we persuade them that our achievements are for their benefit, not just our own; that our work is central to their success, not just our own; and that our respect is for the circumstances of their lives, not just our own," he said.

STRAUSS UNDERCOFLER/COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, left, newly inaugurated Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Chair of University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees Grace Fey smile during the ceremony Friday. The medallion that Lombardi was awarded during the ceremony hangs from his shoulders.

Lombardi acknowledged that budget cuts had set back the University's ability to compete with other institutions. He asked for a sense of shared purpose within the community to transcend the self-interest of departments and offices.

Concerning UMass' competitive edge in the world of great research universities Lombardi referred to time as the University's greatest challenge.

"If money matters, performance counts, and time is the enemy, how then do we know what to do first? The answer is simple; we focus on the academic imperative."

"Because the University is so competitive and each day offers an opportunity we must take, a challenge we must meet."

He spoke to the concerns of faculty by saying that each priority set must be done so with an eye to the core of the University's mission –teaching and research.

"We find our faculty and staff salaries today, so we can remain competitive in the faculty marketplace tomorrow. We serve our community today, so our society will prosper tomorrow," Lombardi said.

"We will choose the culture of achievement over the culture of complaint," he said "Complaint is easy, it is self indulgent and it earns few friends. Achievement is hard, but it attracts support and earns respect."

Lombardi acknowledged that the Amherst campus is part of a statewide system, but maintained that the campus must retain its identity as the flagship.

"This place we call UMass-Amherst, where we embrace the academic imperative, is the founding campus of the University of Massachusetts, and the system's flagship institution," he said. "We carry a proud tradition of academic achievement and enjoy a high national reputation for the quality of our programs. This is a classic American research university."

Lombardi said that UMass must work harder to raise more of its own fiscal support.

"The systems that encompass these campus-based institutions serve critical functions everywhere, and the quality of system leadership makes a significant difference in the ability of the campuses to succeed," he said.

"Systems manage the political environment, protect the institutions, and above all, secure revenue from their state's budget. Good university systems delegate most functions to the campuses and hold each campus accountable for its performance."

"Whatever the structure, the work of research universities always remains focused on the campus-based faculty, staff, and students. The key indicator of the importance of the campus comes from students and faculty, who always identify their academic work by campus: Berkeley, UCLA, Davis, not the University of California. They speak of Indiana University Bloomington, University of Wisconsin Madison, and the University of Massachusetts Amherst... UMass-Amherst has the authority, the responsibility, and the opportunity to make the choices that will determine our success."

Lombardi's fire and brimstone speech lasted 22 minutes.

Before Lombardi addressed those in attendance, members of the campus community spoke about their experiences thus far and their hopes for his future with the community.

President Bulger, representing the state and system, stated that "UMass truly is a great University," adding that as it "reaches the new century the community continues to prize learning for it own sake, and benefits the larger community that is the Commonwealth."

He recognized Lombardi as a man who he has thus come to know as someone who "sees solutions rather failure" and had a "laser focus on building and working."

Faculty Senate representative Ernest May said that he had heard the new Chancellor say that "the people on campus were better" than Lombardi had expected, and that the "contextual challenges are even worse."

May said that he felt Lombardi had already begun to "speak the gospel of UMass Amherst," and concluded his welcome by saying, "May the force be with you."

Representing the student body, largely absent from the Friday morning ceremony, was SGA president David Carr. Carr announce that he believed Lombardi's reputation had not been "built on planning but on accomplishment."

He called the Chancellor a "colorful guy" and said that he gives the "UMass student body something hard to find on campus lately – hope."

"Our degree will be worth more each day," Carr said.

Perhaps the greatest flattery as well as advice came from the Lombardi's long time friend, John W. Ryan, President emeritus of Indiana University at Bloomington.

Ryan called Lombardi "the most honest, most unpretentious, most effective leader I have known." He advised Lombardi as a member of the administration to, in the words of Herman D. Wells, "remind yourself every day that administration must be a servant, not master, of a University."

Bush says Iraq deceiving world

By WILL LESTER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W.Va. (AP) – President Bush said yesterday that Iraq has fooled the world for more than a decade about its banned weapons and the United Nations now faces "a moment of truth" in disarming Saddam Hussein.

"It is clear that not only is Saddam Hussein deceiving, it is clear he's not disarming. And so you'll see us over the next short period of time working with friends and allies and the United Nations to bring that body along," Bush told congressional Republicans at a policy conference.

He said the terrorist acts of Sept. 11 changed America and the world. Before the attacks, Bush said, "We were confident that two oceans could protect us from harm. ... We are now a battleground. We are vulnerable."

Bush said the U.S. public needs to understand that the country is expanding the fight against terrorism to Iraq and elsewhere.

Saddam "wants the world to think that hide-and-seek is a game that we should play. And it's over," Bush said.

The president spoke as chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said in Baghdad that he saw a beginning of Iraq's understanding that it must seriously observe U.N. demands for disarmament. U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed El Baradei said he expected the Security Council to give the inspectors more time "as long as we are registering good progress."

Asked later about Blix's statement, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer noted that the president has said: "Given the fact that Saddam Hussein is not disarming, time is running out."

Blix and El Baradei are to make their next report to the U.N. Security Council on Friday. That could be pivotal toward determining whether the United States should launch military action against Iraq.

In his speech, given while the inspectors held a televised news conference from Iraq, Bush said, "It's a moment of truth for the United Nations. The United Nations gets to decide shortly whether or not it is going to be relevant in terms of keeping the peace, whether or not its words mean anything.

"But one thing is certain, for the sake of peace and for the sake of security of the United States and our friends and allies, we will disarm Saddam Hussein if he will not disarm himself."

Bush said "it is important for the country to realize that Saddam Hussein has fooled the world for 12 years, is used to fooling the world, is confident he can fool the world."

Earlier, Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, dismissed movement toward compliance by Iraq as another attempt at "cheat and retreat."

"We have seen this game with Iraq many times before, throughout the '90s," she said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

United Nations chief weapons inspector Hans Blix, right, listens as International Atomic Energy Agency head Mohamed ElBaradei speaks at a news conference at the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad yesterday.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said a reported French-German proposal to increase the number of weapons inspectors in Iraq in hopes of averting U.S. military action is "a diversion, not a solution" to disarming Saddam.

"The issue is not more inspectors. The issue is compliance on the part of Saddam Hussein," Powell said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

He added that if the weapons inspectors say in their next report – due Friday – that Iraq is still not cooperating "then the Security Council will have to sit in session immediately and determine what should happen next" and "start considering a resolution that says Iraq is in material breach and it is time for serious consequences to follow."

The French-German plan would call for the deployment of thousands of U.N. soldiers, reconnaissance flights and a tripling of the number of weapons inspectors, according to the German magazine Der Spiegel.

But the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Michigan's Carl Levin, told "Fox News Sunday" that "it seems to me we ought to be welcoming efforts to forestall war, even if we disagree with those efforts after we read them. We should not treat the U.N. Security Council as some kind of a stumbling block."

Powell said there would be no need for such a plan if Saddam does what he is supposed to, such as revealing the whereabouts of alleged-ly unaccounted for anthrax and other deadly chemical and biological agents.

That can be handled with a mere handful of inspectors, Powell said.

Also yesterday, Pope John Paul II ordered a special envoy sent to Iraq to emphasize his plea for peace and encourage Iraqi authorities to cooperate with the United Nations, the Vatican said.

Social programs and education need to remain top priority

AmeriCorps, which is a domestic version of the Peace Corps, is facing financial troubles. The group, which was started by the Clinton administration in 1993, gives volunteers education grants and approximately $9,300 a year in living expenses.

There are currently 50,000 AmeriCorps volunteers working on 2,000 projects nationwide. Another 2,500 recruits were waiting to start 79 other projects this month, however the program signed up more recruits than it can afford.

Spokesman for the Corporation for National and Community Service, Sandy Scott said the projects should be up and running again once Congress passes more spending bills, which will likely happen this week. The program attributes some of its problems to the increase in volunteers following the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks after President Bush called on Americans to do more for the country.

AmeriCorps requested $37 million for the education trust fund in the budget year, and is waiting for Congress to complete its spending bills. This delay is hurting the local programs that these volunteers serve. Programs are worried that the delay will cause volunteers to leave to find other jobs. They also cannot begin recruiting volunteers for the summer or for next fall until Congress acts. AmeriCorps is worried that these local programs will begin to lose faith in the national program altogether.

The budget problems are also affecting the volunteers themselves. Many of the volunteers cannot sit around and wait for answers, they're beginning to send out resumes and look for jobs to pay the bills. Student volunteers are also beginning to worry about whether or not they'll be able to pay their tuition and other expenses for this semester and in the future.

This shouldn't be happening.

Since it's in inception, AmeriCorps has been more than a project to cure the nation's problems such as homelessness and illiteracy. It's also been a program that has drawn college-aged students into active engagement with their communities, while helping them pay for college. It's a two-way street; communities benefit from the work of volunteers and college students gain more than just tuition money, but life experience and the opportunity to serve their country in a peaceful manner.

With the cost of higher education continuing to rise, and the continuing need for volunteers across the country, the government should give more support to AmeriCorps as well as creating similar programs.

AmeriCorps has helped many students pay for college that they otherwise wouldn't have been able to pay for. With more jobs requiring college degrees, it's tough for students who cannot afford college to find viable funding options. In general, more should probably be done about the costs themselves, however that's not the end of the problem.

As the drums of war are beginning to roll, the government needs to remember the problems that need to be solved on our own shores. The government needs to keep education and programs like AmeriCorps top priorities.

The absence of advising at UMass

Approximately a month into the fall semester I decided it was time to track down my English advisor, meet him and ask for his advice. Strolling into Bartlett Hall one afternoon when I had a moment free I made my way up to the English department's floor and began the hunt for my advisor's office. I found his office – the name on the door was not his. In the English department's office I asked if he had moved to a new office. I was told no. My advisor had retired the secretary said. Well, I asked patiently, had a new one been assigned to me? The large bulletin outside her door listed my name under his section of advisees, who had thus not changed it?

No. No new advisor had been assigned, but yes, the list on the bulletin had just been updated that week. They would leave his name on there until his students were reassigned. "When will that be?" I asked, my heart sinking as I stood in an office operated by UMass – where undoubtedly any change would take at least four to six weeks. The secretary replied that I should stop by later in the semester if I had not heard from, most likely via email, my new advisor. Then she asked if I'd like to see one of the general advisors who were handling students whose advisors had retired. I said yes, made the appointment and walked back up the hill in a state of utter disappointment.

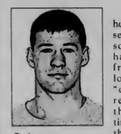
"The advising process is something that, if improved or simply reorganized, would improve the quality of contact between undergraduate students and the faculty and administration."

There is no telling what you will find when you track down your advisor at UMass. Out of my three advisors, none are satisfactory. They do not know of one another's existence, they do not know about much outside of their department. My Commonwealth College advisors are unable to help me with my question concerning my English major, nor are either of these advisors able or willing to help me with my learning differences, so I have a third advisor from LDSS (this advisor changes with each semester since they are general), graduate students doing work for their masters – furthering the confusion). This semester, when I add my second major, Political Science, I will have a fourth advisor. Why can I not have one general advisor, who I get to know over my time on campus, and whose job it is to work with me on answering the overload of questions and concerns I will have in that time?

As a freshman interested in English my first steps were towards the pre-major advising center that "they" (a.k.a. the New Students Program) direct almost everybody to. Once into the major, the English department was my next advising stop, which as you read previously was not a successful one.



However, as the campus becomes more familiar and more avenues appear for guidance – paths that should be clearly lit immediately upon enrollment for all students – several additional options have become available. Before sitting down to complain, I ventured online to research what advising options students have and found several that are not advertised by the University as options. The most valuable result of my quest was the discovery that in my college, Arts and Sciences, there is an advising center for students within the college's majors. It appears that each college has something of the sort, and if you are a student athlete or part of the SOM conglomerate you undoubtedly have separate and special advising centers available for your advantage.

If you search on the UMass web page for advising a list of options does appear offering you a myriad of choices. But who knows which one will not simply add to another lengthy list of people you meet with, who don't know you, and more often than not don't care to?

Part of a great advising system is the ability for students to utilize a set of advisors for their encompassing knowledge of and experience with the University as a whole, and with students interested in similar things (such as majors). What makes an advising program excellent is when those wise and helpful advisors are able to get to know their advisees over a period of time – as this makes it easier to advise the student. The advising process is something that, if improved or simply reorganized, would improve the quality of contact between undergraduate students and the faculty and administration. Additionally, it would establish a contact for students to center themselves on, touch base with, and find in times of general chaos – which appear often on campuses as large, diverse and busy as this one.

Bad things written on dead trees

Robert Carey

The homeland security advisory system has moved from "yellow" to "orange" in recent days, the second time that the threat of terrorist attack has been increased since that fateful September day. The most recent move, which took place on Friday, was in response to intelligence sources that said there has been increased terrorist chatter.

This vague and enigmatic report has lead some to wonder whether or not John Ashcroft will festively issue a "red" warning, four days before Valentine's Day. As this country moves along the color wheel into deeper hues of warning, I pine for the arrival of good news – the type of good news that doesn't come at the expense of someone else. The kind of good news that isn't sappy drivel about rock stars at soup kitchens or safer liposuction procedures for bovine America. For once I'd like to open the newspaper and read about something that will benefit the broader cross-section of the human race, and that might redeem my belief that, at least, in some ways the world, and the people in it, are getting better.

Today, the front page of the newspaper is the same as it has been in months. On it, we have the latest skinny on Iraq. It's the same song and dance as yesterday's write-up – inevitable war at the absence of proof. The Iraqi write-up continues onto another page, and by the time I'm done reading it I barely have enough energy to begin reading the weekly write-up on America's slumping economy. As I flip through the pages, I find stories about: Sri Lankan rebels recruiting children soldiers, numerous car-bombings in the third world, a water shortage crisis in Ghana, and the lingering presence of apartheid in South Africa. In articles closer to home, I read about staph infection, a billion dollars in embezzled tax money, and a number of violent crimes resulting in death.

"Where are the stories about advancements in environmentally friendly fuel, about legislation providing for the needy, and about people generally caring about others on a broader scale than just a few isolated incidents?"

In one article, that seems all too ironic, the Bush administration's budget plan intends to "overhaul" institutions that began in the '60s known as the Great Society Programs. According to the article the Great Society Programs were established to aid the poor and elderly with health benefits. The program also supports preschool programs for disadvantaged children. The proposal that Bush has laid out for approval by Congress would freeze federal support for such programs leaving the poor, the elderly, and needy children to fend for themselves. Way to go George.

I have to flip five pages before I find anything about that whole shuttle thing that took place Saturday morning. Apparently, some guy, probably affiliated with NASA somehow, is promising to figure out what went wrong. I'm amazed and ashamed by my own apathy of the Columbia situation. When I was six and watching the Challenger explode I remember the front-page media blitz that carried on for months afterward. This time around, with Americans more exposed to the horrors of premeditated violence, a space debacle that claimed the lives of a mere seven people is only deserving of a small article wedged between two ads for women's underwear.

It is possible to find some good news. A small briefing located between stories about how much an art patron paid for a Van Gogh and a blurb about a Separatist gunman from Spain I find a story about a guy who donated a kidney. In another section I find a story about people recovering from violence and disaster in Moscow. I think I see something promising in the Business section, but it turns out to be an article about how stock investors can reap a profit from the arrival of love day this coming Friday. While some of these stories have something of a positive connotation to them I find that what I'm really looking for escapes me. Where are the stories about advancements in environmentally friendly fuel, about legislation providing for the needy, and about people generally caring about others on a broader scale than just a few isolated incidents?

If we take newspapers as a cultural reflection of a society then how will people think of us in years to come? Will Americans be seen as a culture of violent, self-serving and thus self-suppressing people? Is there anyway we can circumvent the selfishly insecure ideology, which is quickly sinking into the sub-conscience of the public?

Although difficult, as a society of humans we are all accountable to make good news through the best of our means. And while evil and awful things will always exist, at the very least, all of us should be actively striving to maintain the pretense that as freely acting organisms we have some control over the outcome of a brighter destiny.

Letters to the Editor

American compassion deserves more credit

To the Editor:

In response to Yousef Munayyer's piece, "On flags and moments," I claim that our society has not grown numb to death, suffering, and pain. When I talk to people about the Columbia tragedy, they are genuinely grieved for the loss of our astronauts. The crewmembers who lost their lives embodied the most positive aspects of the human spirit. Yes, I said the human spirit, not just the American spirit. The astronauts were driven by a thirst for knowledge, adventure, and the universal dream to soar into space. Speaking for myself, I was terribly grieved upon learning of this accident; I still am, and I know that the sentiments of my fellow citizens are as deep as mine.

Mr. Munayyer, you argue that we should feel grief for every loss of life. I agree. It is horrible when we hear about epidemics of disease and famine killing thousands of people. It seems commonplace to overlook the fact that we, as a nation, are doing something about it! It is the United States that dropped food on the people of Afghanistan while we liberated them from Taliban rule (note: when the U.S. bombed Afghanistan, women and children were not targeted). It is the United States that is going to spend billions of dollars to assist AIDS victims in Africa. It is the United States of America that is always first to send food and medical aid to other countries.

Also, you argue that we are "pushing to go to war that has not been provoked by an attack." Have we all forgotten what happened on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001? By claiming that we are starting a war that has not been provoked, you make a very hypocritical and controversial statement. What about the 3,000 people lost that day who were targeted because of their innocence? To claim that their loss of life does not justify going into Iraq, disarming Saddam, and liberating its people from a regime that cares nothing for human life, is to devalue those lives. Many people would argue that Iraq had nothing to do with that attack. Secretary Colin Powell has recently proved otherwise.

The American people deserve more credit for their compassion to others. Where is your profound grief for the 3,000 Americans who died going to work? With all due respect, it seems that the one who is devaluating life here is you sir.

Talk of Sexually transmitted infections & diseases

Sex-iversity

Sara Brumfield& Winnie Chen

Q: My boyfriend wants to have anal sex, but I'm scared to try it. Is it safe and will it hurt?

A: Anal sex can be both safe and enjoyable with the necessary preparations and precautions. First, lubrication is very important - anything water-based, like K-Y jelly, Astroglide or Aqua Lube (but not Vaseline). Condoms are also very important – and not just to protect from sexually transmitted infections. The anus can harbor bacteria, so it helps protect from any diseases or infections (that may or may not be classified as an sexually transmitted).

There are also products – Anal Ease is one example – that can be used on the anus as a numbing agent to lessen the pain of initial penetration. You can find these products at speciality shops like Intimacies in Northampton. However, it is important that you don't use too much; otherwise it could be a painful next morning. Make sure there are no oils (just water-based ingredients) in the product as well; otherwise it'll break down the condom, making it porous and fragile.

You have to be really careful and take things easy – especially in the beginning when you're getting accustomed to it. In fact, some preliminary exploration sessions can be helpful in getting a better idea of how you'll want to proceed. Anal sex is traditionally known to be enjoyable for men because of the prostate gland located inside the male anus, but when done with care and consideration, anal sex has been known to be enjoyable for women as well. Open communication is always important in making sure you and your partner are comfortable and enjoying your time together.

Q: I heard that it's possible to get sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) from having oral sex. Is that true?

A: There is actually a fairly long list of sexually transmitted infections (STIs) that you can contract from having unprotected oral sex. Let's list them alphabetically.

Cytomegalovirus (also known as CMV) is not one of the more popular STIs, but it shouldn't be overlooked. CMV can be contracted via unprotected oral sex, and since it is a virus, you will always carry it. Unfortunately, there are usually no symptoms. Some symptoms may be fatigue, nausea, fever, swollen glands and loss of vision. The only way to test for CMV is by getting a blood test. There is no cure, because CMV is a virus. Using a condom is the most effective way of reducing your risk.

Next up is Gonorrhea, the bacteria that can cause sterility and pelvic inflammatory disease (PID). Gonorrhea can be spread through unprotected oral sex. Some symptoms include burning urination, pelvic/abdominal pain and abnormal discharge from the vagina or urethra. Keep in mind that 80 percent of women and 10 percent of men show no symptoms at all. An exam is necessary for a proper diagnosis. Since this STD is of a bacterial nature, it can be treated with antibiotics. Again, condoms are a very effective way of reducing the chances of infection.

Both Hepatitis A and B can be contracted by having unprotected oral sex. Common symptoms for both strains include severe fatigue, fever, hives, loss of appetite and vomiting. A blood test is the only way to test for both Hepatitis A and B. Since Hepatitis is a virus, there is no cure. However, there are vaccines available. While condoms may help against infection, kissing and other intimate touching can also spread the virus.

I know many of you may be upset to learn this, but both Herpes strains (HSV1 and HSV2) can be spread via oral sex. Symptoms usually surface anywhere from two to 20 days after infection. However, an outbreak may not occur for years. Possible symptoms include itchy, rashes with blistery sores, burning during urination, swollen glands in the groin area, fever and painful ulcerations when the blisters break open. Herpes may also be passed from the genitals to the mouth and from the mouth to the genitals and can be diagnosed either through a blood test or by samples taken from the sores. It will remain in your body for life.

There have been a few cases of HIV being spread via unprotected oral sex. Although not as common, it

Seether hits Northampton

South African musicians pack in the crowds

By DAN LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON - For a minute there, it felt like 1995.

South African rockers Seether played a sold out Pearl Street Night Club Thursday night, bringing a brand of music to the area not seen since grunge rockers like Pearl Jam and Nirvana were in their youthful hey-day. Their set included a mixed bagged of hits and misses, featuring work primarily from their recent major label debut, "Disclaimer."

Seether opened with three of the first four songs from "Disclaimer." The band offered up raucous versions of "Gasoline," "69 Tea" and "Needles" right out of the box, drawing the crowd into the set early on.

The band then made a fatal mistake: rather than closing with their breakthrough hit "Fine Again," they played it in the middle of the set. The cover of the song was outstanding, but the overflowing crowd started trickling through the door not long after.

Seether at their best is a reincarnation of the early 90s grunge bands able to tear it up sonically while at the same time maintaining a melodic balance and refreshing sincerity in their performance. Frontman Shaun Morgan's expressive vocals, which shift between the reflective and the roaring, compliment the bands guitar work with the riffs morphing between crunchy and soaring pretty easily.

That isn't to say there weren't weaker moments, however. What the early departed missed was a set that was hit and miss thereafter. Sizzling versions of "Your Bore," "Hang On" and "Pride" were balanced by plodding, dull versions of "Driven Under," "Pig" and a new song that sounds like it could have been a "Disclaimer" throwaway. It's not that the weaker moments were bad; they just failed to sustain the excellence that Seether at its best offers.

The highlight of the latter part of the set was "Hang On," which was released last week on the Daredevil soundtrack and does not appear on their album. The song seems destined for heavy radio airplay, with an infectious riff and the typical superhero-suitable lyrics.

The band then closed with the snarling, swaggering "F— it," pulling the remainder of the crowd back into the show. At this point, perhaps half the crowd had gone, but those that stayed jumped right back into the set.

The ensuing encore offered a musically weak rendition of their ballad, "Broken," with RA singer Sahaj providing backup vocals on the acoustic piece. The song came off flat, a disappointing ending to a relatively good night of music.

RA took the stage before Seether and impressed nearly all in attendance. With an eclectic muscular mix of music, RA captivated the swarming crowd there primarily to Seether with a combination of melody, strong vocals, and driving rhythms. The crowd was up and roaring long before the band closed with their breakthrough hit "Do You Call My Name." The highlight of their set was a cover of Korn's "Blind," with Seether frontman Morgan lending the throaty vocals necessary for the tune.

Local band Nitro Nine opened the show. The band's muscular music showed promise, but was held back mainly by a weak vocalist.

A how-to guide for maximizing your holiday

Running with Scissors

Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

Valentine's Day is once again upon us, and the ladies of "Running with Scissors" are here to give you lonely hearts, and not so lonely ones, some tips on how to spend Feb. 14.

Here are suggestions of the best things to do with a special someone.

TRADITIONAL DATE

You can't beat dinner and a movie; it is the most basic activity for the Valentine's Day clueless. Make reservations early, however, and pre-buy your tickets; otherwise you and your date will be out on the curb or on your way to a McDonald's. Also you may want to skip out on high doses of garlic or on a whole lot of Mexican food on the off chance your date might be close to your mouth by night's end.

STAY IN

While this might be a better suggestion for more established couples, staying in on Valentine's Day does have its charms. Rent a movie you haven't seen and make dinner together or, if both of you aren't the culinary type, call for take out. It beats going out strictly because you can don pajamas and fight the cold.

GET A LITTLE BIT DIFFERENT

Often times, the best dates are the ones that are unconventional. While going out for dinner is pretty common, going to a zoo likely isn't. Not that the ladies of "Running with Scissors" are suggesting you hang out with the chimpanzees on Valentine's Day, but a little creativity never hurt. Going to a karaoke bar is style to some; others might enjoy a carpet picnic in the living room.

GO FORMAL

It never hurts to dress up a bit and go out for a serious night on the town. If your significant other happens to really be into the ballet or really enjoys a particular play, Valentine's Day might be the night to aim at getting tickets. Although needing pre-planning, it is well worth it. On the flip side, you could dress down and go to a basketball game or a movie.

BE MEMORABLE

You could use Valentine's Day to make new memories of things neither of you have done before. Always meaning to go ice-skating with your significant other? Perhaps Valentine's Day is the day to do it – although be careful not to break your ankles. Never tried sushi? Maybe you could try it together; just start out small. At the least, do something you will remember next year.

Valentine's Day is often associated with much pressure, but really shouldn't be. The most important point is just to enjoy the other person's company. Of course, there's always another side.

Valentine's Day. Probably the most awful holiday to ever exist as it makes normally content singles like myself feel like complete horse manure about one's dating status. So if you're single, here are a few ideas to make things a little more tolerable and happy for the single portion of the population.

HAVE A THEMED PARTY

Parties are fun regardless of what's going on, and if you host a party for single people, or single girls or guys only, it's a guaranteed success, for you can pick and choose who you want to spend

Hard rock band from California makes a name in New England with its 'Inertia'

By DANIEL BOURGEOIS
Collegian Correspondent

There has been quite a bit of talk lately about the California-based hard rock band, The Exies. They've been hyped up as one of the most promising acts in recent memory, and this debut album was all but guaranteed to be one of the freshest sounds to hit rock radio in a long while.

The Exies 'Inertia' Virgin records

On top of that, Matt Serletic, the mastermind behind all three of matchbox twenty's albums, was set to produce this album as well. With many of the top music critics and an extraordinary producer behind them, it seemed that the world was about to get a taste of something new, and first on the CD, also the lead single, appears to do just that.

"My Goddess" is the type of rock anthem that comes on in your car, and you can't help but try to sing along with it while you subconsciously press the accelerator a little harder than you should. The Exies don't stop there. "Calm & Collapsed" does a great job keeping with the standard set.

"No Secrets" surpasses it, starting out low and building up into a full-fledged musical assault. Singer Scott Stevens' voice cuts deep when singing the chorus, "I got no secrets/ I give myself away/ I get so damaged/ watch me slip away/ I get so damaged/ because my whole existence was you."

But the adrenaline doesn't last for the other half of the CD, and when the slow things down, it becomes hit or miss. "Can't Relate" starts out with promise and falls flat at the chorus. "Irreversible" is especially lacking. The biggest mistake, however, is the final track; the snail-paced "Genius," which would be a great song if not dragged through the mud with lyrics such as, "She's a wonderful wonder/ she crashed down like a thunder."

This doesn't mean The Exies can't slow it down without losing it. In fact, "Creeper Kamikaze" proves just the opposite. It's a haunting track that starts out with a particularly chilling acoustic guitar riff. About a minute into the song, the band join in, accompanied by a mournful and exceptional string orchestra. This is one of the most addictive songs to be recorded recently, and if it hits radio, it will surely be a huge success.

"Inertia" does not necessarily live up to the early hype and pressure placed upon the band's shoulders, but all in all, it delivers a whole lot more than many of the rock releases of late. It also showcases the extreme amount of potential The Exies possess. You can clearly hear what the band wanted to do, but they fall just short of accomplishing that goal. However, it is definitely worth a listen, especially since it is less than $10 at most music stores. A couple of freshman follies aside, this is a solid effort by a talented young band.

Kate Hudson film splashy and simple

By ALYSON ZILLMANN
Collegian Correspondent

If you walk into the theater expecting a romantic comedy, an airy film with a predictable plot, "How to Lose a Guys in 10 Days" won't disappoint you. The film doesn't promise anything new, but Matthew McConaughey and Kate Hudson have a frisky and sexy chemistry.

'How To Lose a Guy in 10 Days'
Directed by Donald Petrie
Starring Matthew McConaughey Kate Hudson
Paramount

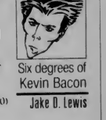
The plot and characters are hopelessly exaggerated, but that's what makes this entertainment. Kate Hudson plays Andie Anderson, the resident "How to" columnist for a popular women's magazine, Composure (Cosmopolitan equivalent). Andie has aspirations of writing about meaningful social issues, such as politics, poverty and religion. Instead, she ends up with, "how to lose a guy in 10 days." For this assignment, she must go out into the field and snag a man, then repel him using every female faux pas in the book. Her guinea pig is a hyper-masculine advertising executive Benjamin Barry (McConaughey).

However, unknown to Andie, she is also a guinea pig in a scheme to secure an advertising deal with diamond moguls the DeLauers. Ben's boss is ready to give the deal to two vixens, "lips and hips," whose feminine insight he feels is better suited to market diamonds. Ben's only chance to get the deal is if he is able to make a girl fall in love with him in 10 days, proving he knows what women desire. Ben thinks Andie will be an easy catch, but even as he gloats that she is already falling in love with him, she is whispering under her breath that Ben will be wishing he was dead before she's finished with him.

Members of both sexes can enjoy the classic female mistakes Andie makes trying to scare off Ben, which range from annoying clinginess to crashing his poker night with the boys. In one scene, Ben opens his medicine cabinet to find the space invaded by Vagisil and tampons. Then there's the embarrassingly feminine name she gives his member and the ugly rat dog she sticks him with that has a penchant for peeing on green felt. The recognizable female blunders are funny, although Andie exaggerates them to psychotic levels.

'How to Lose a Guy in 10 Days' includes quaint charm from its stars, Kate Hudson and Matthew McConaughey.



The only problem with the movie is that in the blink of an eye, Andie transforms from man's worst nightmare into a model girlfriend. In one scene, she's continuing the farce at a rigged session of couples' therapy, and in the next, she's charming Ben's family. In a way though, it's a relief, because Andie and Ben can finally give in to the natural chemistry between them. There is a tender and beautiful love scene in the bathroom of Ben's parents' home where the acting seems more genuine than at other points in the film.

Overall, "How to Lose a Guy in 10 Days" is very superficial – even "Sex and the City"-ish when Andie is together with her female associates. There is some attempt to make her character seem like an unapplied intellectual with a graduate degree from Columbia, but Andie seems far too suited for her shallow column. It's difficult to imagine the glamorous, well-dressed, manicured Andie with her plush lifestyle, doing justice to anything other than shoes, liposuction or laser surgery. Though the movie may not have multiple layers or profound messages, the lead characters hold it together with good looks and comedic talents. Hudson is a blossoming comedienne with perky, endearing naive charm similar to her mother Goldie Hawn, mixed with a little Meg Ryan.

Who to see for personal sexual health is still a serious risk. Some symptoms of HIV include rapid weight loss, lack of appetite, purplish growths on the skin, chronic PID and a thick, whitish coating of yeast on the tongue or mouth (known as thrush). Diagnosis is traditionally done by a blood test; however, it is now possible to diagnose HIV by swabbing the inside of the mouth for cheek cells. There is no known cure for HIV.

The Human Papilloma Virus (HPV) is carried by three out of four adults and is possible to spread HPV through unprotected oral sex. Symptoms for HPV include warts on the genitals, urethra, anus or throat. However, most HPV infections are not visible and show no symptoms. An exam is necessary to diagnose HPV. There is no cure for this virus; the warts can be successfully treated. While condoms may help, it is very possible for the virus to shed beyond what is protected by a condom.

Molluscum Contagiosum can be contracted through unprotected oral sex, but it can also be contracted by nonsexual intimate contact. Symptoms for this virus include pink/white, polyp-like growths in the genital/thigh region. If infected through casual contact, polyps may appear on other regions of the body. Diagnosis requires an exam. The growths are removable, but the virus remains in the body for life. Condoms help, but be aware that just like with HPV, it is possible for the virus to shed outside the condom-protected area.

Pubic lice (a.k.a. crabs) can be spread to a partner through unprotected oral sex. Possible symptoms are severe itching in the genitals and mild fever. It is possible to see the lice with the naked eye. There are several over the counter medications available for pubic lice.

Scabies can also be passed through unprotected oral sex. Some symptoms of Scabies include intense itching and small bumps/rashes. Though there are several effective medications available to treat Scabies, it is hard to detect with the human eye, so an examination is often required.

Syphilis is yet another STI that can be passed to a partner from unprotected oral sex. Syphilis has three phases, so there are a wide range of symptoms, depending on which phase the Syphilis bacteria is in. Possible symptoms include chancre sores, rashes, sore throat, hair loss and muscle pains. Syphilis can be diagnosed either through a blood test or an examination. Syphilis can be cured using antibiotics. However, if the bacteria go too long untreated, the damage may be irreversible.

Q: I got really drunk at a party last weekend and ended up sleeping with a guy I don't really know. I'm on the pill, but I'm still worried about STDs. What kind of test should I take, and can I have it done without my parents' finding out?

A: If you call the University Health Services at 577-5101, they can set you up with an OB-GYN appointment. When you get there, it's important to tell the nurse practitioner that you want the bill to be charged to your mandatory university health insurance to ensure that it's not charged to your parents' insurance. You'll also want to ask them to test for all STIs, which includes a pap smear, a urine test and a blood test. The pap will test for a yeast infection, gonorrhea, chlamydia, human papilloma virus (HPV, genital warts) and cervical cancer. The blood test can check for HIV/AIDS, syphilis, pregnancy and Hepatitis A, B, and C. A urine test will be able to identify pregnancy and urinary tract infections. If you don't want to go to UHS, you can contact Tapestry Health in Amherst (413-548-9992) or Planned Parenthood in Springfield (413-732-1620). Both have a sliding scale for their service fees and can keep your tests confidential. It is very important that you specify where you want your billing to go, to ask questions and to make sure you're being tested for all STIs/STDs. If you don't ask, many places won't test for all possible diseases.

AMHERST – "mOthertongue" is UMass' department of comparative literature's multilingual periodical. Any student in the Five College system looking to express themselves in language other than English can submit their poetry, prose, lyrics, one-acts and artwork for the ninth publication of "mOthertongue." The publication is considered a vital project that simultaneously creates a mutual respect of various cultures and awareness of the similarities of creative expression.

Submissions should be sent to "mOthertongue," 303 South College, University of Massachusetts. Due Feb. 14, they should include contact information of the author and a translation of their original work. For more information, contact mOthertongue@email.com.

AMHERST – Emily Romney, chair of the voice department at Longy School of Music in Cambridge, Mass., will present a master class on vocal pedagogy on Feb. 14 in room 44 in the music wing of the UMass Fine Arts Center.

Romney approaches her "Teaching the Teaching of Singing" as treating the human voice as a living instrument and focuses on its biological, anatomical and theoretical aspects. Students will learn about the voice, interact with professionals and try their hand at teaching. Romney offers her class, scheduled for 1:30 to 3:30 p.m., free of charge. For more information, contact 413-545-2227.

AMHERST – Renowned early music ensemble, Lionheart, takes a leaf from medieval composer Guillaume de Machaut's book and brings forth a Thursday, Feb. 13 concert at 7:30 p.m. at UMass' Bowker Auditorium. Lionheart has been highly praised for its interpretation of medieval and Renaissance a cappella music.

The event, titled "Guillaume de Machaut: The Cure For Love," is part of the UMass' Fine Arts Center Series Events. Tickets range from $7-25. For tickets and information, call the Fine Arts Center box office at 413-545-2511.

NORTHAMPTON – "Eusebius" is a concert combining live music, video, lights and more into a stunning aural-visual experience. Pianist Danny Holt debuts his multimedia work at Smith College on Saturday, Feb. 15 at 8 p.m. and Sunday, Feb. 16 at 5 p.m. in Earle Recital Hall, Sage Hall.

As a pianist, Danny Holt brings classical music into the 21st century, meshing classical music and rock concert aesthetics together for his multi-media performances. Admission is free of charge. For more information, call 414-585-ARTS.

HARTFORD, Conn. – Midori, cited one of the world's most infamous violinists, will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at The Bushnell Center for the Performing Arts on Thursday, Feb. 13. The concert is part of the Webster Classical Series and will be held in The Bushnell's Mortensen Hall. The show starts at 7:30 p.m.

Midori's television appearances have ranged from the 1992 Winter Olympic games telecast and several CNN programs to "CBS Sunday morning," A&E's "Breakfast with the Arts," "Sesame Street" and "The Tonight Show."

Tickets are available at the Bushnell Box Office, located at 166 Capitol Avenue, Hartford. Ticket prices range from $28-75. For more information, call 860-987- 5900. On the Net: http://www.bushnell.org.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass. – The Williams College Museum of Art (WMCA) will present "Wait Until Dark: Night Photography from the Collection of Jay Richard DiBiasio," an exhibition of nocturnal photographs. The selected photographs in the exhibition will be both in color and black and white. The exhibition opened Feb. 8 and will continue through July.

The exhibition also coincides with DiBiasio's 25th class reunion and is open to the general public until July 6. For more information, call (413)-597-2429. On the Net: http://www.williams.edu/wmeu.

'Running with Scissors' gives Valentine's Day advice

have everyone come over dressed as their favorite animal or something silly along those lines to take everyone's mind off what the day is supposed to mean. Have lots of food, booze and music, and that'll assure a good time.

SPEND IT WITH A GOOD FRIEND

Best friends are comforts to have around all the time – especially if you're feeling rather single and miserable on Valentine's Day. Rent a few movies, cook some dinner and make fun of all the annoying couples that you know. That's always a fabulous way to spend such a greeting-card fabricated holiday.

GO TO A BAR

It is pretty much guaranteed that all of the uptown bars will be littered with single, angry people looking to get a little intoxicated Friday night. Misery loves company, and if the day has got you down, head uptown for a little fun with mind-altering liquid and many others in the exact same boat as you.

CHECK OUT UMASS HOCKEY

The Mass Attack is in full effect this Valentine's Day with a game against none other than UConn. Now, UConn kicks our butts every year in basketball, but our hockey team is definitely better than Connecticut's. Head down to the Mullins Center with some other angry, single individuals and channel some of that resentment on some UConn fans. It's free and guaranteed fun; nothing quite compares to watching guys on skates kick the crap out of each other.

Ultimately, it is possible to make such an abominable holiday fun. Just find some kind of amusing spin.

Some people might claim we're shallow, but then again, we are always right, and we hope we've been able to give some of you a few ideas of what to do this Valentine's Day – no matter what your dating status is.

Youthful Minutemen experience growing pains which (Thomas Pöck) had never played defense before this season.

Of course, these are not excuses for losing eight of nine games as the Maroon and White has. And for coach Don Cahoon to bring the program to the point where it is a power in Hockey East, this dissipation of energy cannot continue.

Having said that, it is easy to see why the Minutemen are struggling so. Though most of the frosh played somewhat long seasons before arriving in Amherst, those who played prep school played shorter periods and those in juniors played a far less wide-open type of game than is seen in college.

The fact is, this team is more than likely the most talented one in school history. Take the 2002-03 season for what it's worth – barring an unbelievable run by the River Hawks, the Minutemen will be in the playoffs for the first time since Cahoon took over the helm. The eight wins in Hockey East posted by the Maroon and White ties the school record, set in 1998-99.

The season may be a disappointment in the end, but if so, it is only because Cahoon's squad showed its fans just how much talent it possesses.

Despite long-range success, lack of inside game leads to setback

"We made very few mistakes on defending the first shot," Lappas said. "They probably shot in the 20s on their first shot. But you're not done playing defense until you get the rebound. So I guess we were half good, half horrible."

On offense, the Temple match-up zone resigned the Minutemen to firing away from deep.

"The way they play defense they don't give you much except 3s," said Anderson, who was 6-for-13 from behind the arc.

UMass was 9-for-30 from 3 on the afternoon while taking only 17 shots from inside the arc. Lappas was pleased with the shooting performance but said that grabbing a few more rebounds on both end could've changed the outcome. Asked if his team is capable of performing better on the glass, Lappas responded, "I think it could've been better enough to win this game."

But there are things that just aren't correctable in such a short time, like Lee's size disadvantage.

"What am I gonna do?" Lappas said. "Gabe you have to press 300 pounds by Wednesday."

just 3-13-2 in Hockey East play, by a score of 3-2. UMass could have clinched a playoff berth with a victory, but instead need some help, and some wins, to get in. The Mass Attack currently sits in sixth place in Hockey East. The conference's top eight teams make its playoffs.

The weekend reminded me of the feelings about Boston a few years ago when the Bruins were bad, the Patriots were worse and the Celtics were god-awful. As for the Red Sox, well, they were the same as always, of course.

Back then, Boston talk radio guys called the city "Loserville, U.S.A." Hopefully, Amherst isn't heading in that direction. It doesn't seem that way; hockey and men's basketball are loaded with young, talented players who will be in Western Massachusetts for years. But this weekend felt too much like those years in Boston before the Pats came around.

It gets worse. Searching outside the realm of the Mullins this weekend won't help you find many other UMass winners, either.

The women's basketball team was taking on the worst team in the A-10, St. Bonaventure in Olean, N.Y. The Bonnies came into the game with a 5-15 (2-7 A-10) record and, of course, beat the Minutewomen (12-9, 4-6 A-10) 56-50.

Ahh, let's go check out the softball team. That's one of the most dominant teams on campus. Surely they fared well down at the Fiesta Bowl Tournament this weekend. They are the No. 24 team in the nation.

Not so fast, my friends. Coach Elaine Sortino's crew had to match up with some of the best teams in the entire country and posted a 1-3 record in Arizona. The three teams they lost to were Nos. 4, 10 and 14 in the nation. Yeah, that's fair for one weekend. Despite the impossibly tough competition, the softball team lost the three contests by a total of just five runs and even took No. 4 Nebraska into extra innings. But a loss is a loss and they finished 1-3 on the weekend.

The swim teams split with Boston College in their final home meet of the season and the ski team had one of its worst outings of the season. I've been hearing from our resident ski writer about how good the ski team has been – and it has been very good – but even that UMass squad couldn't fight the curse of this weekend.

For UMass Nation, hopefully this was just an aberration.

The men's basketball team hosts a very solid Richmond team on Wednesday.

Hopefully, Amherst's stand as Loserville, U.S.A. will only last one weekend.

Mullins Center Massacres

UMass drops pair

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Over 6,000 fans packed the Mullins Center on Friday night, extending well into the upper areas of the arena. Aside from a scattered amount of Boston University supporters, they came to see the Massachusetts hockey team recreate some of the magic it displayed last Dec. 6 against the Terriers.

But Sean Fields wasn't about to let the UMass faithful leave happy a second time.

The BU netminder pitched his fourth shutout of the season, while Brian Collins and Mark Mullen tallied goals as the Terriers (17-10-2, 10-8-0 Hockey East) knocked off the Minutemen 2-0. Hoping to rebound on Saturday against a struggling UMass-Lowell team, the Maroon and White (14-15-1, 8-13-0 Hockey East) instead dropped its fifth straight game and eighth of its last nine in a 3-2 loss.

For Fields, his 25-save effort was especially gratifying, after he and his teammates took a 4-1 lead against UMass only to lose a 5-4 decision the last time the two teams met in Amherst.

"I didn't have my A-game the last time, and kind of gave the game to them," Fields said. "I was looking for a little redemption this time around."

The boisterous crowd of 6,286, the third-highest attendance in UMass hockey history, was quieted soon after the puck dropped, as Collins poked home a rebound off of John Sabo's blast five minutes in to put the Terriers on the scoreboard. Just 90 seconds later, Jeff Lang nearly tied it as freshman Matt Anderson fed him for a point-blank laser, but the puck clanged off the post. The horn sounded, bringing the fans to their feet, but referee Joe Andrews waved off the potential tying score.

Mullen added an insurance goal early in the second period on a great individual effort. The junior picked up a loose puck near center ice, shook off the pursuing Lang, and shelved a backhander over UMass goaltender Gabe Winer. Winer (12-9-1) made 17 saves in the losing effort.

"I thought both goalies played great tonight, but I thought Fields was a little sharper," BU coach Jack Parker said.

The Minutemen had numerous scoring chances as the game progressed, but could not solve Fields. Late in the second period, Thomas Pock slid a pass right in front to senior captain Tim Turner, but Fields was able to deflect just enough of the shot to put it out of play. UMass then had an easy opportunity on a five-on-three power play early in the third, but Chris Capraro couldn't put the puck into the wide-open net on the doorstep.

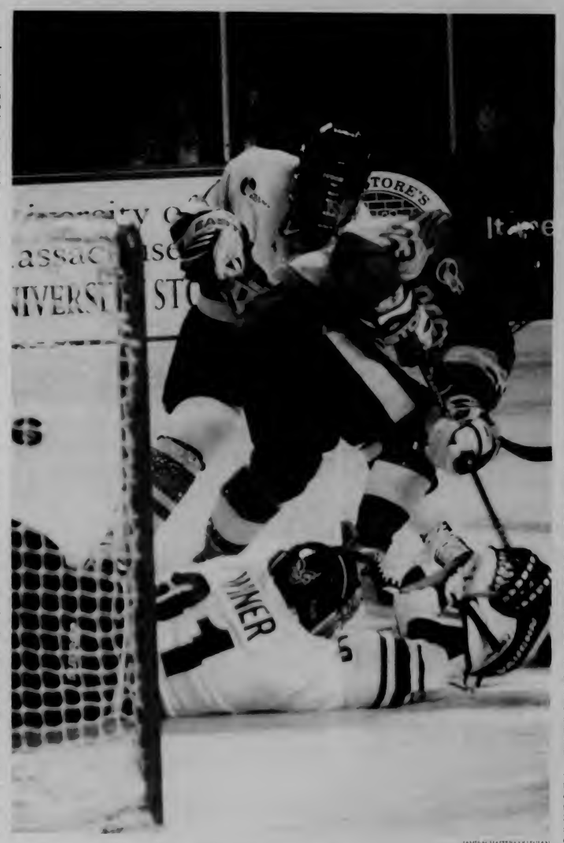
"Those were our opportunities, and if we bury the puck in those opportunities, it's a different game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

On Capraro's chance, the Mullins Center horn went on yet again, despite Andrews immediately signaling for no goal. The play was soon blown dead, sending the faceoff outside the zone.

"I don't know who is in charge of the horn, but I'd like to talk to him," Cahoon said.

UMass looked to end its losing streak against the River Hawks on Saturday, but Ben Walter's third period goal broke a 2-2 tie and lifted ninth-place Lowell (10-15-3, 3-13-2 Hockey East) to the 3-2 win over the Minutemen. The Hawks' Darryl Green fired a shot in on Winer, but the puck squirted to Walter for the game-winner.

Ed McGranic and Elias Godoy also scored for Lowell, who avoided being swept by the Minutemen in the quest for the Alumni Cup. UMass defeated the River Hawks twice in November.



"I don't have an adjective to describe how good this feels," UML coach Blaise MacDonald said.

Despite being a recurring problem throughout the year, the River Hawk goaltending tandem of Dominic Smart and Chris Davidson (3.84 total GAA) combined to only allow goals by Greg Mauldin and Josh Hanson.

"We got enough pucks to the net, but the quality wasn't that great," Cahoon said.

Meanwhile, the third-year coach quickly dismissed the notion that the Minutemen played down to their opponent.

"I think the team we played was a stronger, more physical team," Cahoon said. "It's never in this league about not respecting an opponent."

Boston University was able to silence the season-high crowd of 6,286 with a 2-0 victory and hand the Minutemen the first of a pair of weekend setbacks.

Team is showing signs of fatigue

Matt Brady

Following a weekend in which it posted a pair of come-from-behind wins against Boston College and Providence College in early January, some people began calling the Minute- men "The Cardiac Kids."

Now, with the team having lost eight of nine games, it seems more like the team is in cardiac arrest.

Everyone seems to be asking the question, "What is wrong with the Minutemen?"

But seeing how things have gone in the past, and how they likely will go in the future, the progression of this season should not be a tremendous surprise to anyone.

Everyone knows that the Maroon and White is a young, inexperienced team. A large portion of UMass' nucleus is an incredibly talented freshman class that is one of the best in the nation. And now it seems that those rookies are getting worn out.

Often in college hockey, freshmen jump out to an amazing start, only to see their play drop off as the season progresses. Last season, top scorer Greg Mauldin notched 24 points in 33 games, but just six over the final 12 contests. The Minutemen's number two freshman scorer last season, Craig MacDonald, had just one point after Jan. 12.

A similar tapering is easily viewed in this year's squad. Matt Anderson and Stephen Werner have had stellar freshman campaigns (24 and 26 points, respectively) but have combined for just six points in the last eight games – games in which UMass has averaged fewer than two goals per contest.

Watching the Minutemen, it is evident that the season is wearing heavy on their younger players especially, but also on the veterans, who need to shoulder a greater portion of the load with the youth of the team fading.

The line changes are nowhere near as crisp as they were earlier when the team was climbing the ladder toward national recognition. Players are struggling with every stride to get off the ice after a shift.

The Maroon and White defense – which for most of the early part of the season was a strength for the Minutemen – is now getting beat on odd-man rushes left and right, hanging their goaltenders out to dry. The dump-ins to get line changes are getting stopped short of the blue line or going for icing calls at an increasingly steady rate. Mentally, physically, emotionally – this team is wiped on all levels.

The loss of Kelly Sickavish due to injury – he has not played since Dec. 7 and may not return this season – left an inexperienced Minuteman defense short one of its most reliable forces in the defensive zone. Sickavish's absence from the lineup has spelled fewer days off for a seven-person defensive corps that includes two freshmen, three sophomores and two juniors, one of

Lack of rebounding costs Minutemen against Owls

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

It is one of the simplest things to do in basketball. It's fundamental, like dribbling or getting back on defense.

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas can cite any shortcoming from youth, to size, to lack of talent to explain the problem.

Temple	61
UMass	50

But his squad has allowed boxing out and rebounding to become its Achilles heel.

That was the story again on Saturday afternoon in a 61-50 loss to archrival Temple.

"This is ridiculous," Lappas said. "That's where the game was lost for us. Look at the points in the paint. 24-to-2. That's hard to do."

The Owls were dominant on the glass with a 44-26 rebounding edge and 18 offensive caroms.

UMass point guard Anthony Anderson attributed the rebounding distinction to a lack of energy.

"It didn't seem like the intensity was there today," said Anderson, who led the team in rebounding with seven.

"It's really a problem when Anthony Anderson is your best rebounder," Lappas said.

Keith Butler and Antywane Robinson manhandled UMass' frontline of freshman Gabe Lee and seniors Micah Brand and Jackie Rogers.

The rookie duo combined for 18 points and 24 rebounds, while Butler added three blocks.

"Keith Butler played an excellent game," Temple coach John Chaney said of his 7-foot, 250-pound center. "He's a real smart kid on the floor."

With the 6-foot-9-inch, 202-pound Lee guarding him, Butler had 10 points in the game's first 10 minutes, capped by a lay-up that gave Temple a 16-13 edge with 9:42 left in the period.

Brand replaced Lee and played 21 ineffective minutes. He was just 1-for-4 from the field for two points and grabbed just a single rebound.

The Owls led 30-22 at the intermission and stretched the lead to 11 with 10 minutes left thanks to some sharp shooting from freshman guard Maurice Collins.

The rookie had 10 points on the run including a jump shot from the elbow to make it 48-37 with just under 10 minutes to play.

A 3-pointer from Anthony Anderson (18 points) started an 8-0 UMass run.

Two made free throws by Jeff Viggiano cut the deficit to three with 4:54 left but an ill-advised 3-point miss by Brand turned into a made jumper by Alex Wesby and four more points from Collins to seal the game.

Despite a team-high 16 points from Collins and David Hawkins, UMass' defense was solid from start to finish.

GERALD LINDQUIST/COLLEGIAN

Senior Jackie Rogers managed to grab only four rebounds and the Minutemen were outrebounded as a whole 44-26 in Saturday's 61-50 loss to Temple.

Are we living in Loserville?

Jim Pignatiello

Ugh.

Three games. All at the Mullins Center. All in-conference. All against major rivals. All against beatable opponents.

All losses.

On Friday, the hockey team started UMass' weekend off with the third largest crowd (6,286) in its history. It was a great achievement to the hard work and increasing success put in by coach Don "Toot" Cahoon and his players.

It's too bad that there was little else to celebrate for the rest of the weekend.

The crowd began on its feet Friday, but was quieted just five minutes in when Boston University's Brian Collins put one past Gabe Winer. The Minutemen were shut out 2-0 to fall to 14-14-1 (8-12 Hockey East).

Saturday didn't go any better for UMass. The men's basketball team (8-13, 2-7 Atlantic 10) was set to take on its biggest A-10 rival, Temple, on ESPN, but the satellite feed died and only the final minute or so was televised. This turned out to be a blessing, as only 4,787 fans showed up to half-pack the Mullins – which certainly wouldn't have impressed any possible recruits – and the Minutemen fell 61-50.

Under coach Steve Lappas, the team is certainly headed in the right direction, with young, exciting players and even more coming in next season. But it is going to take some time – at least another year – before the team is a legitimate contender to make the NCAA Tournament.

Hours later, hockey returned to the Mullins Center ice for a chance to complete a three-game sweep of UMass-Lowell and finally have a UMass team earn a win at the "Big M" for the weekend.

Nope.

'Loves-me-not' raises awareness

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

Over 20 volunteers and staff from the Everywoman's Center and from Safe Passage, a battered woman's shelter in Northampton, spent the morning distributing daisies and information concerning issues of stalking and violence against women yesterday.

The "Loves Me Not" anti-stalking campaign continued the work of the Everywoman's Center and Safe Passage in their efforts to raise awareness of stalking, its prevalence, and what resources are available to victims and survivors of stalking.

Volunteers and staff handed out daisies and information in the University of Massachusetts campus center, in Northampton and at Smith College. The event took place from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Safe Passage offers counseling and transitional housing for battered women. The center also offers assistance with finding permanent housing and work, parenting support and education, and a 24 hour hotline.

A legal referral program also assists victims of domestic violence in locating an attorney. The center recently celebrated its 25th year of creating solutions and support for battered women.

The Everywoman's Center is a campus-based women's center that provides leadership in promoting educational access and equity for women. The center's mission is to empower women to take full control of their lives and strengthen the connections among women. The Center sponsors five different programs and two projects designed to serve the needs of the UMass and surrounding community.

Another campaign sponsored by the Everywoman's Center is the "Got Consent?" poster campaign, designed to raise awareness of sexual assault.

Volunteers and staff working on the "Loves Me Not" campaign felt that the information being distributed, as well as the flowers, helped to raise awareness of an issue that otherwise receives little attention.

"We wanted to do this campaign because people really don't know much about stalking. We wanted to bring it to the forefront, talk about it explicitly," said Nicole Manganelli, a project coordinator in the Everywoman's Center's Education Advocate Program. "We also thought with Valentine's Day coming up it would be a good time to catch people, to get them thinking.

According to a study by the United States Department of Justice, each year an estimated 1,006,970 women and 370,992 men are stalked in the U.S.

Sixty percent of female victims and 30 percent of male victims are stalked by an intimate partner. According to the study, one in 12 women and one in 45 men will be stalked in their lifetime.

"We know people know about stalking but often people don't really get it. Many people think that it only effects celebrities," said Ben Ostiguy, a campus educator from the Everywoman's Center. "We think that the flowers will give people a chance to stop and think that stalking really does happen, even on college campuses."

Many students found the campaign informative, and some found it comforting.

"I thought my ex-boyfriend was just going through a phase after our breakup, but then he began to call my house excessively. I realized it was getting too much when I went out driving with him and he swerved the car on purpose," Lindsay Pemberton, junior nursing and pre-med major, said. "Before it happened I thought stalking just happened in books and movies. When it happened to me I felt alone. Seeing anti-stalking issues being raised is now comforting."

The "Loves Me Not" project was

Glover and Sanchez speak at UMass

Actor and poet/writer celebrate black history

By Amy O'Neill
Collegian Staff

Cheers and applause filled the Fine Arts Center Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts last night when actor Danny Glover and poet/writer Sonia Sanchez came to speak on "The Responsibility of the Black Artist in the 21st Century."

Following a performance of the Black National Anthem, "Lift Every Voice and Sing," by former member of Sweet Honey In the Rock, Evelyn Harris and UMass Professor Emeritus Horace Clarence Boyer, who played the piano, Department of Afro-American Studies Professor, John Bracey introduced the two talented activists.

"These are two people who really need no introduction," Bracey said. He went on to describe Glover and Sanchez's backgrounds including their recent failed attempt in New York to receive a permit to hold an anti-war protest.

"It's the kind of calm way they go about producing excellence," said Bracey in reference to the achievements of Glover and Sanchez. "They think it's normal that you can write a poem...that it's normal that you can stand in front of a camera and be somebody else."

Sanchez, whose friendship with Glover has spanned over 30 years, explained how she first met him at San Francisco State University through the first Black Studies Program in America. She explained how it was difficult at that time to teach the works of black authors such as W.E.B DuBois and how the FBI attempted to have her thrown out of her apartment because she was teaching him.

"I kept saying 'I'm teaching black literature which comes from a very civilized movement,'" Sanchez said. "What that FBI man taught me was that he was saying simply 'We have banned DuBois from curriculums. No one teaches DuBois. No one teaches those black folks.'

"And what we did was we rescued these men and women from obscurity, from the banning...we brought them back full circle...you cannot have a proper education unless you read those black folks."

After enthusiastic applause, Glover spoke on his introduction to the Civil Rights movement in the 60s, which for him also began in San Francisco. He said that one of the main things that came out of the movement for him was realizing that young people needed to be activists.

"I was moved by the ideas of young people being activists, and being apart of a much more larger, defining definition, defining future," Glover said.

According to Glover, who attended San Francisco State during a time when liberation and free speech were hot topics, he realized his potential for making a difference during this time. He explained how he often went to hear poets speak and remembered the first time he heard Sanchez speak and how, among so many, she really stood out.

"She stood out powerfully in that movement," Glover said. "And I kept going and going and going."

He talked of how even though he was attending school, he was still unsure of what he was going to do.

"Basically, I didn't have any idea exactly, what direction I was going. But that movement, at San Francisco State, it was climbing, gaining opportunities to hear other voices, to hear men and women who had been involved in the underground and grass root organizing of the struggle. And that was a very important foundation for me."

Glover explained how it was at this time that he began to act in plays at black theater companies around the San Francisco Bay Area. He remarked how he thought it was funny because at this time, when he was 20 years old, he had no history on the stage.

The crowd erupted in laughter when he told a story of his mother and how she would say things to him about how he never had a line in a church production but "everyone else did."

"I would say hey, I'm doing the best I can!" Glover exclaimed with a chuckle.

Glover talked of how by the time he was 21 and 22 years old, he had read the works and plays of several black authors.

"We discussed those works as students. We sat down and began to take those works, the writing, the application and also how we can someday envision ourselves and understand those writings in terms of our struggles," Glover said. "And for me, one reason that I spend so much time on campus, along with Sonia, is because, we in a sense want students to understand how vital that was for us, how important that was for us. As we come to understand what we do and the place where what we do plays in the whole scheme of things. Not only who we are, but what we have to say as artists. That is essentially, if not

Iraq agrees to allow U-2 surveillance flights over territory

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Iraq agreed Monday to allow U-2 surveillance flights over its territory, meeting a key demand by U.N. inspectors searching for banned weapons as European opposition to American military action mounted.

President Bush, however, brushed aside Iraqi concessions as too little, too late.

"This is a man who is trying to stall for time," he said after a meeting with Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch U.S. ally against Iraq. "The reason we need to fly U-2 flights is they're not disarming."

Iraq's acceptance of the U-2 flights, as well as its submission of new documents to the United Nations over the weekend, marked Baghdad's latest step to stave off a U.S.-led attack and convince other governments that it was now ready to cooperate in full with U.N. inspectors.

Key European governments insist that Iraq's cooperation is sufficient to allow inspections to continue and delay military action. On Monday, France, Germany and Belgium vetoed a U.S.-backed measure to authorize NATO to make plans to protect Turkey in the event of attack by Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the United States and willing allies would plan to help Turkey "outside of NATO if necessary."

In a joint statement later Monday, France, Germany and Russia called for more inspectors to disarm Iraq without resorting to war.

"Nothing today justifies a war," French President Jacques Chirac said at a news conference in Paris with Russian President Vladimir Putin. "This region really does not need another war."

With the threat of war looming large, Baghdad appeared eager to display new cooperation with the inspectors in hopes of encouraging opposition to an imminent military strike. The announcement came days after five Iraqi scientists gave private interviews to the U.N. weapons inspectors.

"The inspectors are now free to use the American U-2s as well as French and Russian planes," Mohamed al-Douri, Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations, told The Associated Press in New York.

In a letter sent Monday to U.N. weapons inspectors, Iraq also pledged to pass legislation next week outlawing the use of weapons of mass destruction.

On Sunday, chief U.N. weapons inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei said they sensed a positive Iraqi attitude during weekend talks in Baghdad though they acknowledged they had achieved no "breakthrough."

Blix and ElBaradei had said they expected agreement on the surveillance flight issue by the end of the week. It was unclear whether U-2s have been flying over Iraq as part of secret U.S. intelligence-gathering.

Now that Iraq has given its consent, the high-flying planes can operate over the country with Baghdad's permission and provide their findings to U.N. inspectors.

Iraq had objected to such flights as long as U.S. and British jets continued patrols in the "no-fly" zones.

On Monday, U.S. and British bombed a surface-to-air missile site Monday in the southern no-fly zone, the U.S. military said. The Iraqi News Agency reported two civilians were killed and nine others were wounded.

Iraqi forces regularly shoot at allied aircraft patrolling the northern and southern no-fly zones that Washington and London say are designed to protect Shiite Muslims and Kurds.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher described the Iraqi moves as tactical retreats. He said Iraq still had not indicated whether it would comply quickly and fully with U.N. disarmament demands.

Britain's U.N. ambassador, Jeremy Greenstock, said Iraq's latest moves indicated "some progress on procedure" but "that doesn't add up to the real change in Iraq's attitude that we're looking for."

Blix and ElBaradei report on Friday to the U.N. Security Council about their weekend talks in Baghdad. The report will help the U.N. Security Council decide whether to support a new resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq.

Many on the council are waiting to hear the reports before deciding whether to allow the inspectors more time or move toward a military solution.

Britain, America's staunchest ally, is preparing a new resolution that would authorize force against Iraq, diplomats have said, and Bush has said "the game is up" for Iraq.

However, the use of military force faces strong opposition among key U.S. allies such as France and Germany, where opinion polls show overwhelming majorities of the populations support a peaceful solution.

Those divisions widened Monday at the NATO meeting in Brussels. France, Germany and Belgium argued that supporting NATO's efforts would force the Iraq crisis into a "logic of war."

Housing Service employees work in front of the burnt out shell of the building in North Village that was on fire Sunday night. Arrests dominate UMPD's weekend

By Dan LaMothe
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police forces experienced their first busy weekend of the semester, with four arrests made between Friday and Sunday morning.

"There were a couple of arrests," UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons said.

UMPD forces arrested a male Saturday morning after two separate calls were reported from Southwest of two males breaking and entering residence hall rooms.

A student in Kennedy Tower called at 9:27 a.m. and reported that two males were in his room when woke he up. The student said they ran off when they noticed he was awake, and that a Sony Playstation was taken from the room.

Lyons said that a student in John Adams Tower also called UMPD Saturday morning and reported that two males had knocked on his door earlier in the morning asking for drugs.

The descriptions that both students gave were similar. Lyons said that after an area search, a UMPD officer found two males matching the description. The officer arrested Richard F. Salomon, 19, of Leominster, Mass., and charged him with larceny of an object worth more than $250 (the Playstation), breaking and entering in the daytime and disguising oneself to obstruct justice.

There was not enough evidence to arrest the second man, but he was trespassed.

Police also made an arrest after a disturbance was reported at 1:35 a.m. on Sunday. Lyons said that a police unit approached John Quincy Adams Tower and noticed a com-

11:06 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in Marcus Hall. An ambulance responded and transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

4:14 p.m.: A backpack was reported stolen from the Textbook Annex.

5:13 p.m.: A caller in Brett Hall on Infirmary Way reported that someone threw an orange through the cluster office window.

5:59 p.m.: A motor vehicle was reported stolen from Lot 64 on Hicks Way. The caller called back later and reported that she found her car in Lot 64 exactly where she left it.

TUESDAY FEB. 4

5:57 a.m.: A caller reported that a driver side window was smashed and a radio was taken from her vehicle in Lot 11 on Stadium Drive. The responding officer transported the victim from Coolidge to Lot 11.

6:22 a.m.: An officer reported that the driver side window looked pried away from a vehicle in Lot 11.

6:28 a.m.: An officer reported that two vehicles in Lot 12 may have been tampered with.

9:42 a.m.: An employee at the University Health Center on Infirmary Way reported a restraining order violation.

11:08 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in James Hall on Massachusetts Avenue. An ambulance responded and transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

4:21 p.m. A breaking and entering was reported in Lot 50 on Kennedy Road. The vehicle was reported unlocked. A CD player and a box of jewelry were reported stolen.

WEDNESDAY FEB. 5

2:10 p.m.: An officer reported that a window was smashed in a vehicle in Lot 11 on Stadium Drive, with a stereo missing and damage sustained to the dashboard. The owner was contacted and met the officer at her vehicle.

2:25 p.m.: A microscope objective was reported stolen sometime since the previous Friday.

5:20 p.m.: A caller reported that the face plate of his car stereo was stolen sometime between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. while the car was parked in Lot 45 on Holdsworth Way. No other items were taken and no damage to the car was sustained.

8:32 p.m.: A caller reported that he lost his wallet at the Textbook Annex. When the wallet was located on a shelf, cash was missing.

THURSDAY FEB. 6

1:31 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in the North Village Apartments on N. Pleasant St. The officers on the scene reported that the Amherst Fire Department transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

4:04 p.m.: A backpack was reported stolen from the Textbook Annex.

10:06 p.m.: A caller reported receiving six threatening phone calls and has one saved on her voice mail.

FRIDAY FEB. 7

1:36 a.m.: An RA reported a disturbance in Coolidge Tower on Massachusetts Avenue. According to the RA, a group of about 15 people refused to disperse from the 15th floor lounge. The officer checked the area after the group started to disperse.

8:17 a.m.. An RD reported that the janitorial staff in Field Hall found anti-semitic graffiti on the sixth floor outside of the elevator.

8:24 a.m.: A caller reported that a snow plow hit a parked vehicle on N. Pleasant Street.

9:02 a.m.: A delivery truck reportedly drove over a sidewalk and hit a parked vehicle in Lot 65 on Holdsworth Way.

9:10 a.m.: A traffic stop on University Drive resulted in the arrest of James Anthony Shue, 22, of Parkland, Flor. Shue was charged with failing to yield or stop and operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

SATURDAY FEB. 8

12:48 a.m.: A caller reported seeing an intoxicated female staggering in and out of the middle of the road on Infirmary Way trying to flag down cars. An area check turned up negative.

1:18 a.m.: A traffic stop on Commonwealth Avenue resulted in the arrest of Meghan May Schutz, 20, of Hingham, Mass. Schutz was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and possession of a Class D substance.

1:42 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in Crabtree Hall on Eastman Lane. AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

9:27 a.m.: Police arrested Richard Eric Salomon, 19, of Leominster, Mass., outside of Kennedy Tower on Massachusetts Avenue and charged him larceny of an object valued at more than $250 (a Sony Playstation), breaking and entering during the daytime and disguising oneself to obstruct justice.

4:54 p.m.: UMPD forces arrested Emily R. Kline, 18, of Hartford, Conn., on a previous warrant.

SUNDAY FEB. 9

1:35 a.m.: A disturbance reported near John Quincy Adams Tower on Fearing Street resulted in the arrest of Michael P. Browne, 20, of Wakefield, Mass. Browne was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct, possession of a false liquor ID card and possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

3:31 a.m.: A caller in Brett Hall reported that three people took a picture of him while he was in the shower.

4:08 a.m.: A domestic disturbance in John Quincy Adams resulted in the arrest of Seamus P. O'Brien, 20, of Oak Bluffs, Mass. O'Brien was charged with assault and battery.

7:58 a.m.: A maintainer in Dwight Hall on Eastmann Lane reported considerable damage to the first floor men's room. The responding officer reported at least $1000 in damage and requested the on-call RD. Photos were taken.

9:46 p.m.: Student security reported receiving a call that there was a male in the third floor bathroom of Thoreau Hall. An officer reported that an area check turned up negative.

Glover and Sanchez speak at UMass in celebration of Black History entirely, the foundation that forms the work that I do."

Sanchez then spoke on how she sees poetry fitting into the movements of the time. She quoted an African proverb saying: "The King fears only the poet." She then quoted another artist who said "speech is my hammer, bang my world to shape." She agreed that it is a hard world to shape because we want to believe what the world tells us.

"It is possible to live a different way. DuBois said 'the cause of war is the preparation of war,' and I say that the cause of peace is the preparation of peace."

She added that it can be an easy trail or a hard trail but people have to work together.

Sanchez spoke passionately with her eyes closed for a few moments when she said that she uses poetry that causes so many emotions among others, to say: "I am human, I really am human. I shall stay human; this poetry says simply that you are a human being and you can act in a humane fashion...the country conspires to make you less of a human, the country conspires to say if you are going to write that I am going to get on your tail...it can make you think you are crazy when you know you aren't crazy."

She also gave advice to those who were seeing her path as their own:

"But what I am saying simply to those of you who want to write this poetry or short stories, it's a grand undertaking, it's a wonderful, wonderful, wonderful undertaking. Know what it means or what you bring to it, you bring to it your life, or other peoples lives...what can I say that will make this person understand what it means to be human."

Glover noted that he doesn't get caught up in the "superstar" image because of the choices he has made in his career, and the movies that he has done were going to be done with or without him. He said that he has felt intuitively which ones he should be involved with.

"I had a voice through my work," Glover said.

Sanchez and Glover both emphasized again how important they feel it is for young people to become involved in a movement that they feel passionate about.

"Stand on the shoulders," Glover said, "of those who came before us."

Romney reveals sweeping changes to state judicial nominating process today, as promised

By STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Governor Mitt Romney is set to unveil sweeping changes to the state's judicial nominating process today, meeting a campaign promise to overhaul a system critics say is rife with political cronyism.

Romney's executive order would tighten up rules for political donations by potential nominees to the bench and put limits on personal lobbying efforts for those hoping to be named judges.

The changes would also, for the first time, explicitly bar anyone but lawyers from becoming judges. In the past, anyone could theoretically be named to the bench, although historically judicial posts have been limited to attorneys.

Romney is set to unveil the plan Tuesday in a 2 p.m. press conference at the Statehouse.

Observers said the new plan brings a new discipline to the way governors appoint judges.

"The governor apparently really wants to stand up and say there is going to be some accountability here," said David L. Yas, editor of Massachusetts Lawyers Weekly. "The rules of the game are going to be out in the open a lot more than before."

Romney declined to comment on the plan Monday. A spokeswoman said final details were still being fine-tuned.

Romney will name 18 members of a new, 21-member Judicial Nominating Committee when he unveils the plan, spokeswoman Nicole St. Peter said.

"This is still going through a final review," she said.

A draft version of the plan bars judicial nominees from making any political contributions to the governor, lieutenant governor or governor's council while the application is pending. After nomination, the plan bars the judicial hopeful from making any donations to any candidate for county, state or federal office.

Fueled by media reports, there has long been a widespread impression that political contributions have paved the way for some judicial candidates.

Last fall, a review by The Associated Press of nomination records found that more than half of the new judges recommended by the council in the previous five years had donated to the administrations of the governors who appointed them.

The report also showed that three of four new judges contributed either to Republican Governors William Weld, Paul Cellucci and Jane Swift, or to high-ranking Democrats such as House Speaker Thomas M. Finneran, former Senate president Thomas F. Birmingham and former Treasurer Shannon O'Brien.

The plan would also set strict requirements for those seeking judicial posts. All applicants must be members of the Massachusetts bar and residents of Massachusetts at the time of application.

In order to be considered for a slot on the trial court, an applicant must show at least 10 years of legal experience and training. For the appeals court, the plan requires at least 15 years of experience.

The plan also sets tougher mandates for clerk magistrate positions, requiring a college degree or at least 15 years experience in the courts.

Other highlights of the plan include:

-Abolishing regional nominating committees and bringing the function of sifting through applications for the bench under a single 21-member committee designed to be as diverse as possible based on race, gender and geography;

-Establishing a "blind" first phase of consideration, in which the names of candidates would be removed from resumes and judging would be based solely on academic and legal achievement;

-Extending the prohibition on former committee members or their relatives taking judgeships themselves to three years.

Shuttle computer found

By MARCIA DUNN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPACE CENTER, Houston – NASA said Monday it had found one of Columbia's computers "apparently in fairly good condition" and determined that a piece of broken wing was from the space shuttle's troubled left side.

Michael Kostelnik, a deputy associate administrator, said the general purpose computer was found Sunday in a debris field east of Fort Worth. It was being kept at the Johnson Space Center for analysis.

"This was one of the red-tag items," Kostelnik said.

"This may give us some clues as to what actually occurred on the ship," Bill Readdy, NASA associate administrator said.

The wing fragment includes 2-foot piece of carbon-composite panel, a dense material that covered the leading edge of the wing, and a 1 1/2-foot piece of the wing itself. Engineers are not yet certain where the piece fits, Kostelnik said.

It wasn't yet known whether the carbon panel or the silica glass-fiber thermal tiles on the wing had been burned through by the intense heat of re-entry or damaged in another way.

"That's something that the engineers would be looking for," Kostelnik said.

NASA said Friday that the piece was found near Fort Worth. On Monday, Kostelnik corrected that location to much farther east, "closer to Lufkin," 180 miles southeast of Fort Worth. The discrepancy was not explained.

This fragment could be extremely important, given that all the trouble apparently began in the left wing during the final minutes of Columbia's flight Feb. 1. The shuttle broke up above Texas as it returned to Earth, killing all seven aboard.

After the wing fragment was found last week, Kostelnik called it "a significant recovery."

NASA said it also has found the cover of one of the two landing gear compartments, another potentially critical piece because a temperature surge inside the left wheel well was the first sign of trouble. But officials do not yet know whether it is from the right or left side of Columbia.

NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe said debris would be taken this week to Kennedy Air Force Base in Cape Canaveral, Fla., where it will be cataloged and assembled.

Engineers will reassemble as much of the shuttle as they can in a hangar on the Kennedy grounds, and an independent board investigating the disaster will have offices in the hangar.

Kostelnik said engineers are still looking at high resolution photographs of Columbia taken by a powerful Air Force telescope camera, but said "no engineering judgment" has been made on the images.

One photo, taken a minute or two before Columbia broke up, is drawing special interest. A dark gray streak can be seen trailing the left wing, and the leading edge of that wing appears to be jagged.

Kostelnik said resolution on the photos was no better than what was released to the public Friday.

Kostelnik said the agency is also looking at data collected by weather and Federal Aviation Authority radar to determine whether debris or a weather phenomenon could have been factors in the accident.

motion outside.

"He observed two men fighting," Lyons said. "When the officer approached, one of the men ran at the officer to get at the other man."

Lyons said that the officer arrested Michael P. Brown, 20, of Wakefield, Mass. Brown was charged with disorderly conduct, possession of liquor while being under the age of 21 and possession of a false liquor ID card.

UMPD officers made a second arrest Sunday morning after several emergency calls were made involving a domestic disturbance involving about 20 people, both male and female, outside of John Quincy Adams Tower. Lyons said that Seamus O'Brien, 20, of Oak Bluffs, Mass., was arrested for punching someone in the face. Several witnesses were on hand.

O'Brien was charged with assault and battery.

The final arrest for the weekend came after a routine traffic stop on Friday morning. UMPD arrested James Anthony Chue, 22, of 7200 Cutter Ct. in Parkland, Flor., and charged him with failure to stop or yield and operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Lombardi's presence turning things around already

For weeks leading up to Chancellor John V. Lombardi's Gala Ball and Inauguration, we at The Collegian were subject to a deluge of complaints about the large amounts of University spending poured into the events.

People would e-mail, call-in, write letters and even show up at our door to tell us how useless it was to spend so much money on a party, when UMass is in the midst of more budget cuts.

But after witnessing the elegance and professionalism with which the Ball was conducted and listening to the inspiring tones of Lombardi's speeches, we argue that the class of the weekend's events were fitting only for a Chancellor such as Lombardi.

It's not often that out of a room full of journalists who'll likely never make six figures in their lifetime, the phrase "that guy makes me want to give money to UMass" can be heard. Not to mention the fact that the bulk of the inauguration festivities was funded by private donors, and not robbing the pockets of students as many seem to think. In a sense the inauguration helped to generate money for the school; the Ball itself was catered by the University Catering Service and tickets were available for the dinner at nearly $1,000 a plate. Lombardi helped bring money to the school through this event.

Lombardi is the type of Chancellor this campus has longed for. He is motivated, optimistated and confident and he's not afraid to make a splash.

This past weekend's events only solidify that.

And the last thing he'll do is let somebody spoil his party.

Outside the Inauguration on Friday, members of multiple unions were seen protesting over lack of funded contracts. They sang songs, waved signs, and generally voiced their dissatisfaction on a day that was supposed to be a positive for Lombardi and for UMass.

But the flagship campus' 27th Chancellor was not deterred. He pushed on, riveting those in attendance with his charisma and obvious love for a school he's known for less than a year.

We can be assured that Lombardi will do the same when he champions our cause to the powers that be in Boston. When he informs the people on Beacon Hill that the flagship campus of the Commonwealth's state university deserves more financial support, despite its geographical location.

We have confidence in Lombardi. And that's a bold statement considering the lack of confidence we've had in other major University hires. We questioned Interim Chancellor Marcie Williams' entire tenure. We questioned the hiring of Steve Lappas as head coach of the men's basketball team and the motives of former athletic director Bob Marcum.

In all fairness we haven't exactly put a positive spin on anything the University does. We even wrote about how it was a mistake to hire Lombardi when we heard he left the University of Florida because of a racial slur.

But he, unlike so many other officials, has turned us.

Maybe it's his brief but effective style of public speaking, his hands-on attitude or his uncanny knack to address the most obscure people by name. Fact is he's won us over.

By being a tangible presence on campus and a strong figurehead for the University, he's made us believe in this school. Like someone at The Collegian said a few days ago, "he just makes me want to be at UMass."

And what's a better compliment than that?

Protesting has a time and a place

Dan Lamothe

They refused to be labeled as protesters.

Union workers across campus gathered outside of Chancellor John V. Lombardi's inauguration ceremony Friday morning to sing songs, wave signs and make their unhappiness over lack of funding on their contracts known.

The whole thing came off in poor taste.

Friday morning was supposed to be a celebration of all that is going right with UMass – an acknowledgement of improvements made and successes accomplished since Lombardi arrived in July with an eye on the future and a proclamation of what else the University needs to do to right itself.

The unions' presence outside of the Mullins Center, regardless of whatever literature they handed out stating otherwise, reeked of classlessness. Although it was stated that the protest was not a personal attack on Lombardi, it was an attempt to piggyback on his moment in order to lash out at others in attendance at the ceremony. They even played off on the "Academic Imperative" theme of the event, calling the contract situation the "Moral Imperative" in a pamphlet they handed out.

> "The union's presence outside of the Mullins Center, regardless of whatever literature they handed out stating otherwise, reeked of classlessness."

Several sign holding union members snapped at a Collegian photographer for calling them protesters.

"We're not protesters!" they said. Obviously. There must be some other term for disenchanted peoples who attempt to poison positive events with their own gripes.

Yet I'll still give them credit for trying. I'll give them credit for standing up for their cause peaceably in a bone-gnawing cold with snow swirling around them. It showed dedication to a cause, as the group persevered and even came out in the middle of a snowstorm to make its point.

But there's a time and a place for making that point. It all looked like a lame attempt to upstage a celebration.

No one denies that the contracts should be funded. No one denies that the workers at UMass are getting a raw deal. Or that they should have received a raise years ago, way before Jane Swift or anyone else pulled the rug out on their negotiations out from under them. No one even denies that the workers have the right to be angry at the situation and to express that in no uncertain terms until the situation is resolved.

But the inauguration of a new leader who has done nothing but support the unions' cause is not the place for it.

One of the main reasons for the rally/protest/temper tantrum on Friday is because the Board of Trustees and UMass President Bill Bulger were there. That's all well and fine – both the Board and Bulger should be coaxed with regular reminders that many of the people that work for them are not happy with their employment situation.

But it should be done in other ways. The finger-pointing and "a promise is a promise" point of view is only going to get the unions so far. At some point the group needs to realize that there's no money anywhere right now, and that its day will come. Friday's demonstration was well organized, peaceful and not disruptive to the ceremony, but it just didn't belong there.

The inauguration ceremony was open to the public. Rather than focusing just on themselves, protesters should have pulled up a seat inside at the ceremony and reflected on the fact that much of UMass is doing the best it can to pull itself out of a crisis. What they would have seen inside was a whole lot of hope. Sharing in that hope would have been a whole lot more productive than the usual protest outside.

The bickering should have been saved for another day.

No choice: orders are orders

Lindsey Elder

In a typical duty as a correspondent of the Massachusetts Army National Guard Public Affairs Office, I've attended and covered a vast amount of awards ceremonies, deployments and Change of Command ceremonies. I've had the privilege of meeting recipients of the Congressional Medal of Honor as well as NCOs and Officers who have seen hell and come back again long before I was born or could comprehend what true devotion to duty is. It was at one particular ceremony that I met a veteran who reminded me that when the decision alone is a difficult one to make, the execution of it can be seemingly impossible to carry out. It was at this ceremony that I unknowingly met Lieutenant General Charles Sweeney, the B-29 bomber Pilot who dropped the "Fat Man" atomic bomb on Nagasaki, Japan on Aug. 9, 1945, which brought World War II to a close.

Down on one knee to have a conversation with this older attendee, I was under the impression that the man I spoke to casually while I waited for the Adjutant General and Chief of Staff's formal arrival to the ceremony was a family member of the new commander. He was seated in the section with other family members and was very easy to talk to. It was only when I noticed so many nervous glances and pointing that I realized I might be kneeling before more than I bargained for.

Aside from immediate thoughts like, "Oh Dear God, I was just crouching and chitty chatting with a three-star General," I also now second guessed what I should or should not ask him.

"How did it feel?"

"Do you think you did the right thing?"

What questions could I possibly ask this man that he hasn't been answering for the last half century? In previous interviews, he's stated he has become concerned about what he calls a "culture of ignorance" on many important issues of American history. At the same time, he regrets that even his own 10 children and 20 grandchildren "don't know very much about what really took place" during his historic World War II missions.

In remembrance of history's most horrific global war, no topic has caused more controversy than President Harry S. Truman's decision to drop two atomic bombs on Japan in Aug. 1945.

> "I look at it from the perspective that orders are orders, and this was not something he chose to do."

On Aug. 6, 1945, when 25-year-old Captain Sweeney, a member of the 509th Composite Group, piloted a photographic and observer B-29 close beside the now legendary B-29 "Enola Gay" (itself flown by General Sweeney's close friend, Colonel Paul W. Tibbets Jr). On this mission, the first epochal A-Bomb decimated Hiroshima.

These two historic missions virtually and effectively ended the war against Japan and with it the Second World War.

Lieutenant General Sweeney leaves no doubt where he stands on the grueling decision he had to make in his pivotal role in ending World War II.

"The prospect of a ground invasion was never far from our minds," he noted. "We wanted to prevent it, and we did. We saved thousands of lives, we shortened the war, and we obviated an invasion."

I was dumbfounded and inspired to have met him, however, I know most people in this university have the point of view that they'd sooner spit in the man's face than shake his hand for what he'd done and suffered through.

The reality is that war is hell and when you're forced into action, all that matters is keeping your people alive. I look at it from the perspective that orders are orders, and this was not something he chose to do.

Knowing he was only a few years older than I am now, I can honestly say I don't know for sure if I, or many others for that matter, could carry out such a request.

We spend so much time worrying what's to become of us in the years ahead, we forget to give respect to the men and women who have lived through the same decisions and gave their lives for us to be what we are today.

This upcoming week is the 50th anniversary of the Korean War. But people are too caught up in getting ready to go to Washington, D.C., to riot against the possible war in Iraq to think about who actually died so that they have the right to protest. It still sickens me to see people spending more time to plan protests on Memorial Day than they do to think about why we have it in the first place. Or the fact that people took the time to spray paint "War Machine" on the stone marker in front of memorial hall, just in time for the Army and Air Force ROTC vigil over the building on Veterans Day. A building on this campus dedicated to our own fellow students who have made the final sacrifice.

Lieutenant General Sweeney's courage and dedication to service are something that can never be questioned. Even though fate he knows better than anyone else) that your mission can sometimes be questionable – no matter how your personal feelings may impact it, mission success, not acceptance, is the goal. And as a future officer myself, I will always remember that no matter how difficult a task or decision I am presented with or who is burning a flag in my way, the dedication needed for his flight that August night will be my inspiration.

The real trouble with women

Sean Jacquet

Fellas, let me ask you a question: what's the most frustrating part of your life? I know, dealing with women. Ah, yes, females, how we would we live without them? Well, very happily, I'd imagine. It's like my roommate says "Girls are like Thanksgiving: only good for the stuffing."

> "I've been canned a few times, and I still can't figure out what the hell any of those girls were talking about."

Granted that may be a little harsh, but he does have a point about the maddening nature in which most women act. Now, making girls look bad is like shooting fish in a barrel. I mean they do most of the work themselves. But, I thought I'd outline some of the things that irritate me the most about the ladies.

First: Christmas or anniversary shopping. First you have to decide what to get, which is the most difficult part. The pressure to deliver a knockout, earth-shattering gift is more than I can stand. She's expecting some sexy lingerie or some diamond earrings, and I show up with ill-fitting panties, and a stupid "do you like it" grin on my face.

Which brings me to my next complaint: unrealistic expectations. For instance, "you're not like other guys." I've heard that enough times to know that it's a set-up. Sure it sounds like a kind, heartfelt compliment, and it is. But as soon as you screw up, and you will, you'll inevitably hear: "You're just like all the other guys. I thought you were different, but you're not."

That's right, girls. None of us are different. We're all scumbags. Each one of us is exactly like the next. If you want a model for the average man, look no further than Homer Simpson. Like America's favorite animated buffoon, we're all fat, stupid, lazy alcoholics...but we mean well. All we really want to do is drink beer, watch football, and sleep with your best friend. Women shouldn't expect anything more from our admittedly dim-witted gender. So don't be shocked when we forget birthdays, anniversaries, your name. Instead, regard it as a pleasant surprise when we actually remember any of these things. Especially during the playoffs.

Guys' expectations of girls, on the other hand, are relatively simple: look nice, smell pretty, and be able to slap together a decent BLT (don't forget to toast the bread). Oh yeah, and don't ask what First-and-10 means. If you don't know already, I'll never be able to explain it. I once tried to explain the NFL playoff format to a girl once. It was like explaining advanced calculus to an eight-year-old. I suppose I shouldn't have been surprised. This is the same girl that once asked: "Four downs. Why don't they just do it the first time?"

Men are simple, logical, and easy to deal with. My happiness, for example, relies on three central needs: food, sex, and sports, in no particular order. Granted, when Game Seven of the World Series is on, sports take precedent. And at 2:30 a.m. when the day's sporting events have long since ended, sex, if I'm lucky, becomes the most important thing. But any single one will make me happy. Any combination of the two is even better. I've yet to combine the three, but I think it's healthy for a man to have goals.

Women, on the other hand, rarely make sense whether they're talking about what makes them happy or why they are no longer happy. The break-up is far and away the most befuddling thing about being in a relationship. I've been canned a few times, and I still can't figure out what the hell any of those girls were talking about.

Try on these head-scratchers: "I need time to think," "I have a lot on my mind," and "I don't know what I want." Don't know what you want? Well, you obviously don't want to date me anymore. You have a lot on your mind? One of those things is obviously getting rid of me. Time to think? Yeah, time to think about going out with somebody else. As if getting kicked to the curb isn't bad enough, guys have to decipher female breakup logic on top of that. Listen, ladies, when you send us packing, just give us the bad news straight up.

Lastly, many girls have a hard time detecting sarcasm. For somebody as sarcastic as me, I get in trouble with this frequently. For example, I'll probably get a deluge of angry e-mails from humorless females who don't realize that I'm only kidding. I mean only half of what I'm saying and I think I've made it abundantly clear that I don't know what I'm talking about when I do mean what I'm saying. Except about the whole food, sex, and sports thing.

Sleater-Kinney to play Northampton

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Sleater-Kinney has long been at the core of all that is interesting in rock, its bassless compositions yielding unique arrangements well before MTV proclaimed it the vogue thing to do. Under the divergent melodies and insistent vocals of guitarists Carrie Brownstein and Corin Tucker, drummer Janet Weiss has confidently worked at pushing her art forward, inspiring the notion that one of music's most criminally overlooked roles can in fact become a band's most communicative device.

Her brand of storytelling was again elevated on the 2002 "One Beat," perhaps the most complete album of last year that also just happened to be rock's most cathartic – and self-assured – statement to a nation in newfound turmoil. Ripe with confidence and eager to state its case, the band again cleared a wall that others continue to play straight into.

"I think most importantly it's that we took time off," says Weiss, reflecting on a phone, about the honors "One Beat" has gathered since its release. "I played music, but Corin had a baby, and Carrie didn't play at all. So it's just kind of stepping away from something we were exhausted from doing, and new ideas always just sort of come up when you take time off – [laughs] it's probably the most productive time as far as mentally picking up new ideas. A casual way to explore new things."

The only thing casual surrounding "One Beat," however, are the modest values Weiss shyly assigns to her own art. In 12 tracks, the album asserts itself immediately, a quality usually left for later as time breeds familiarity. More importantly, it fulfills a space in the industry that, musically, most bands seem unsure of how to satisfy. With three talents capable of running and sharing the boards, it seems natural that the band's instinct toward a democratic partnership informs the writing and recording process.

"Usually [Carrie and Corrin] will come up with some sort of an idea for the song; it could just be one or two parts, and then we all work on how to link those together," she says. "The riffs, the bare meat and potatoes of a song will be hashed out by them, and they'll bring it into practice."

A similarly generous spirit influences the sound of the album as well. In a way, the band invites audience participation more than ever on "One Beat," adding new colors to familiar reference points from their own catalogue. For every "Combat Rock," a bracing song that draws from its own energy, there exists an "Oh!" – highlighting the band's more intriguing methods of constructing a three-piece harmony. Of "Faraway," an intimate response to a sweeping tragedy, Weiss says their comfort together as writers allowed for different perspectives during the song's composition. A patience to allow the song a comfortable evolution. In short, a careful sense of attention they were hoping the audience would invest as well.

"With 'Faraway' in particular, I tried to create a drum part that wasn't the first or second or third thing that came into my head," says Weiss. "I know [the album] was really sort of deconstructive in the recording process, layering things on top of each other, trying to give it a strained sort of tension.

"There aren't many times in the studio where you are really sure that was it, that that was the take, I think it's not really until it's done that I personally get the feeling of, 'Oh, we did really good on this one'."

The road, the true litmus test for any act worth its weight, is the most obvious environment for that conclusion to be drawn. Sleater-Kinney mounted initial dates in support of "One Beat" last year, and the latest leg carries them into Pearl St. in Northampton on Thursday. It's here, says Weiss, at every point stateside or overseas, where the band can get an honest grasp on if its goal – that of simply playing good music – is being achieved.

"Tours are the best way to gauge how your music is coming across," she says. "You talk to the kids and see the reactions, the visceral reactions, and not someone who has to meet a deadline or write something they didn't think about. It's much more valuable to play."

Sleater-Kinney will play this Thursday evening at the Pearl St. Nightclub in Northampton. Blues-based The Black Keys open.)

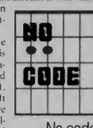
Contracts and politics of the music industry

Does the record industry owe you $20?

Forget for a moment the hours worth of free music you've got idling away on your computer – the senseless collection designed more by your friends and neighbors than your own personal taste. Ignore the bills you've already (and temporarily, of course) stashed back into your purse while sampling a new album – you know, giving it some time to "grow." I agree with you, but let's pretend for a minute that the companies churning out formless pop – whose sales are seemingly and often equivalent to the amount of skin flashed on the cover – are the only ones in bad form. Hold that, uncomfortable as it may be, and think:

An alleged suit raised by the Attorney Generals of 43 states is calling for widespread compensation for consumers who purchased vinyl, cassettes or CDs from Jan. 1, 1995 through Dec. 22, 2000. It alleges that a combination of five music distributors and three retailers came together and implemented Minimum Advertised Price policies, in violation of state and federal laws. I'll spare the details in this brief space, should the legitimacy of the outwardly paper-thin case dissolve altogether. However, legit or not, it's an interesting and relevant question to raise, and I remain struck at how the finer print of the suit becomes a virtual byproduct when stacked next to the eventual – and substantial – outcome the case could play its way into.

Record companies have long taken measures to stiff the consumers they so mightily pander to. In the late 70s, while Tom Petty was busy releasing "You're Gonna Get It" and "Damn the Torpedoes," his label proposed a $9.98 street tag for the follow-up, a price that, at the time, cleared the accepted ceiling by a full dollar. Petty swung back, threatened to dub the album $8.98 regardless of price, and the suits relented. It was a minor victory, however, in a front that's only grown financially stronger and more relentless. Companies tag team with chain outlets to overprice, then "slash" down during sale periods to prices that still clear the top shelf of what an ethical shop would allow.



Which is, of course, common sense. Broken down even just a step further, the numbers do an extraordinary amount of talking. In the late 60s, let's say, one of the few times rock was taking a breath out of passion rather than for commerce, $20 in any given record store would have allowed you the freedom to take home – a moderate guess here – five to six albums. In that day, there was a credible pool to draw from: The Beatles, a still creative Rolling Stones and The Who, about to the seminal "Tommy." In 2003, the same $20 will get you a couple bucks back in change – maybe. Double album? Forget it. No wonder we resort to anonymous thievery, a guilty conscience weighs far less at the end of the day – and month – than the debt you go about quietly amassing in the legalized whorehouse that is your local record shop.

Still, that plundering nature isn't entirely a reason to rally the villagers for a mere 20 spot. True, they should have to cough something up – but I don't want my hands on it. Do you? If the suit plays out as legitimate (the numbers say no, but again – play along) and sends these record companies digging down some $67,375,000 into their wallets, then we as consumers should not be the ones to bear the hefty payout. Chances are, if you've made one of the appropriate purchases to qualify for the payback, there's more than enough allowance in your budget to let this pass – and probably an equal or greater amount still waiting to be spent. Instead, as the $5 and under proposition in the settlement rightly suggests, why not have all refunds pointed squarely at non-profit agencies or charities, so they can prosper proportionally according to how much dime the corporations cough up?

These are times when bigger things than the music industry are directly hampering our ability to live – and think – freely without fear of both minor and widespread repercussions. A corporate pay out to a network of Save the Music Programs, endowments to art enrichment initiatives or the rehabilitation of worn music venues will breed a more welcome environment for aspiring artists and for the young – always and still the most valuable asset we have in any shift toward future prosperity.

Some consider music in all of its forms a superficial pursuit, but if thoughts can change the world, then music is capable of the same – the best of it, at least, those same thoughts tuned to three chords and the truth. The world is a bigger place than $20 dollar checks falling from the ubiquitous hands of Sony or RCA back into ours. Perhaps it's naive, but placing more of that green back at the ground level can only help things grow.

Some professional wrestling debates

There's no denying it. There is a definite stigma attached to professional wrestling. People tend to laugh – or flat out question your mental stability – when you admit you watch it somewhat religiously and can name every wrestler on the roster, along with their finishing moves, without blinking an eye.

See, there is a common belief that professional wrestling fans are nothing more than trailer park residents with bright red necks who spend more time arguing over whether a beer is better because it's more filling or because it tastes great. While I cannot deny there is a white trash element amongst wrestling fans, there are more fans who do not live in trailer parks than ones who do. We come from all walks of life; all racial and economic backgrounds. We are everywhere – behind you in line at Stop and Shop, your roommate, your friend, your brother or sister. Unfortunately, the disgrace attached to professional wrestling keeps many from admitting the truth: that they watch it, that it is fun to watch and that it sometimes provides a way to escape the utter rote that is everyday life to so many of us.

Corner to corner

Emilie Duggan-Hicks

Wrestling is fantasy. We know this already. Still, every time I mention I watch wrestling, I get the same response: "You know that wrestling is fake, right?" Wait, what? Professional wrestling isn't real? Kurt Angle and Chris Benoit aren't really beating each other to bloody pulps out there? Wow.

While professional wrestling isn't real, fake is too ugly a word. A term like predetermined outcomes sounds so much nicer, and it gets the point across just as well. While a match and its outcome may be worked out in advance, there's very little that's actually fake about it. These men and women are top athletes. A majority of them work out on a daily basis, and whether you are a fan of wrestling or not, it's hard not to have just a little bit of respect for what they do. These wrestlers – these athletes – put their bodies on the line three or four days a week as they are thrown through tables, battered with folding chairs and tossed out of the ring onto either concrete or a very thin mat; it's not something just anyone can do.

"A lot of people when trying to get into wrestling really don't have a clue what they are getting into," said World Wrestling Entertainment superstar Lance Storm in a commentary on his

Delivering audiences from the basics

One might expect a disappointment when a movie begins with a voice-over from a supposedly dead narrator and works on a rather contrived and overdone premise that a man receives money to go out with a girl and ends up falling in love with her. One can imagine he or she is in for a twisted version of "She's All That."

However, "Deliver Us From Eva" doesn't offer an unsatisfactory movie experience, because it is uncommonly witty. The contrivedness of the plot doesn't become a problem, because everything about the plot is overdone, cheesy and artificial and the film doesn't pretend to delve any deeper. Everything is over the top – from the main characters (a hardcore player and an independent woman with a massive chip on her shoulder) to the plot to the opening Marvin Gaye dance sequence to the knight on a white stallion ending. It was phenomenal to watch everything that typically makes a bad movie bad, make this movie good.

> 'Deliver Us From Eva'
> Directed by Gary Hardwick
> Starring Gabrielle Union LL Cool J
> Focus Features
> Rated R
> 105 mins.

LL Cool J has a bold and charismatic screen presence, but Gabrielle Union is the real star with her emotional outbursts and 360-degree mood swings.

The secondary characters and their relationships create a sort of "Sex in the City" atmosphere that is promiscuous, sexually explicit and meanwhile clever and hilarious. The dialogue is fast paced and witty... "A messed up man is a redundant sentence," for example. Although this take on sex was certainly liberating, Eva's happiness and life choices were dependent on a man and thus "good sex" served as a cure, making the premise a bit shallow and degrading for women.

"Deliver Us From Eva" will make a good film to take your loved one to this Valentine's Day. Surprise fellows: this film is not strictly appealing to ladies. This movie is about 60 percent geared toward women and 40 percent for the gents, with a lot of gray area to spare.

The Streets strutting about the States

British band begins pirating attention nationwide

By Justin Chellman
Collegian Staff

The United Kingdom has opened its arms wide to American hip-hop. Since the early days, many of our pioneers have done ours stopping there and have had high record sales on the other side of the Atlantic. In the United Kingdom, emcees like Eminem are amongst the most popular acts for the younger demographic.

> The Streets' 'Original Pirate Material'
> Atlantic/Warner UK

We have had a reverse invasion, and now just as with Rock and Roll, the British have been inspired to do their own version of hip-hop. Still, I wouldn't even begin to call The Streets, with vocalist Mike Skinner, a group with music that will come to the United States and bring changes along the same magnitude as the Beatles did in 1964.

Lately, many emcees and hip hop influenced acts from the U.K. have been working their way into U.S. record stores and on U.S. radio stations. The extremely talented Roots Manuva has put out two incredible albums, which showcase his skills and a background of U.K. hip-hop and Caribbean Dub style flows. Now The Streets, originating from a very popular garage style scene in the U.K., have ventured across the sea as well. Although very different from Roots Manuva, The Streets is mentioned together with him just because of where they both began. That's about where the similarities stop.

The Streets' style is hard to explain, because it is not hip-hop, yet at the same time, it is largely influenced by it. But the rapper's flow, if I can call it a flow, is very basic and simple. Skinner raps in a slow monotone style and with very easy simple words; this is all done with his strong British accent, which adds a point for interest in the United States but probably takes something away if one is British. Most of the beats on the album sound more like techno or club rather than what we would call hip-hop in the United States. Nonetheless, the album comes with rave reviews from the U.K. Many magazines have hailed it as a classic, equating it to landmark records like the Sex Pistols "Never Mind the Bollocks."

In the United States, on the other hand, "Original Pirate Material" cannot cut it with the real hip-hop heads. It's not rough, and it doesn't have a feel of the true genuine feeling and experience that good hip-hop in the United States is all about. For lack of better words, it comes off corny and wimpy at times. If an emcee got on a U.S. stage and kicked the rhymes he kicks on this album, he would get booed off stage after another emcee ate him for lunch. Although if listened to in a different context, as more of a pop album, one might be able to see why some enjoy "Original Pirate Material."

Tracks like "Has it Come to This?" have a Fat Boy Slim appeal that might make fans of the happy style with a digital keyboard beat and voice bending of a person. Some of the other songs, like "Turn the Page" and especially "It's too Late," remind of that cluh song from the "Trainspotting" soundtrack where Renton does his "Choose Life" speech. It's in that tone of voice that The Streets music is presented. Much of the time, Skinner is just talking over the beat, which is very chilly, at times, and relaxing, such as in the case on the track "Weak Become Heroes." The last track on the album, "Stay Positive," does have a beat that if rocked properly could be a sick jam. Again, Skinner talks over it, but as long as you are just casually listening, it isn't bad. If, however, you are listening intently, then the chorus will get to you and, like me, you'll probably just want to turn off the CD.

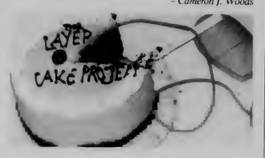
I did turn it off, and now I can say with good certainty that I will probably never turn it on again. To each his/her own, though. Some people might find his simple style fun and his accent interesting for the same reason some people here like the accents in the movies "Lock Stock and Two Smoking Barrels" and "Snatch"; it's different from what those in the United States are used to. I cannot deny "Original Pirate Material" is definitely different. Too different from the U.K. hip hop I enjoy, such as the aforementioned Roots Manuva, so I'll keep my eye out for Manuva's next release and avoid The Streets.

Serving up some free layer cake at UMass Hampden Gallery this month

"The Layer Cake Project" is not a cake-distributing group. It's a digital art experience. It starts as a group or "Cake" of four to six people, each with a digital image of some sort. Each piece is then circulated around the group, and every member makes changes to the other pieces of work. The result is a grid-like display called a layer cake, where one can trace the alterations of each image as it passes through the group.

"It is great to watch each layer cake evolve," said Ryan O'Donnell, project co-founder. "You get to see the impact of different people's thought processes interacting with each other."

Along with fellow University of Massachusetts graduate, Christine Teixeira, O'Donnell started the "Layer Cake Project" as a game played between friends in the Fine Arts Center.



The project has now expanded to include more than 30 people throughout the United States, Italy and Spain. There are currently three "Layer Cakes" on display in the Hampden Gallery, and each will remain open to the public through the end of February.

All the images in a "Layer Cake" are digitally altered; each is as unique as the person that changed it. In one series on display, a radiant and colorful sunburst becomes a psychedelic treasure troll figure that in the next image is a classic glass soda bottle.

"Work like this would be impossible to do with any other type of media," O'Donnell says. "We did not choose digital art just because it was easy or in style; we are using it to push the limits of chaos and collaboration."

If seeing just three layer cakes is not enough to satisfy you, then you can get your fill at layercake.com. There you will find a multitude of "cakes," as well as bios about the people behind the art. New cake makers are welcome to apply through the website for a chance to participate in the "chaos" of layer cake creating.

'Corner to corner' begins its look at wrestling website stormwrestling.com. "For some reason, many fans figure that because wrestling is 'fake,' a word I despise the use of, anyone can do it. Nothing is far ther from the truth. This is a very demanding business. You need to have physical skills, size and intelligence. Even with all three, this may not be enough.

So just to recap: professional wrestling is not for the out of shape, potato chip eating, remote control hogging, armchair wrestler who sits there with his buddies and talks about how easy it is – the one sitting there telling stories about how he would have been an NFL megastar, if not for that darn trick knee. You have to be tough, both physically and mentally. It is not a sport for everyone.

Yes, I just called professional wrestling a sport. I can see scores of people shaking their heads at me, and I can hear their laughter echoing through the campus. But think about it for a second before you write off my choice of terms. According to dictionary.com, sport is defined as a physical activity governed by a set of rules or customs and often engaged in competitively. Professional wrestling, regardless of whether the outcome is predetermined, is still governed by rules. It is still an extremely physical activity. By definition, that makes it a sport. And what of the competition aspect of the definition? Good question, and Lance Storm has an answer.

"In wrestling you may not have to compete for wins, but believe me you do have to compete for your job," he said in another commentary on his site.

"There are a lot more wrestlers than there are spots for workers, so you need to stay ahead of the pack. Staying ahead of the pack requires a lot of determination, hard work and the ability to work through injuries... Regardless of the nature of this business, [professional wrestling] is still a sport."

However, even the words of a professional wrestler – someone who has been in the business for many years – will not be enough to persuade most to look at professional wrestling differently. Because of the prearranged endings and the soap opera-like story lines that accompany every match, it is still considered primarily entertainment, with little doubt it will ever be regarded as more.

However, that is okay. I will continue to view what these men and women do as a sport, for whether professional wrestling is sport or entertainment is purely a matter of interpretation. I just happen to agree with Lance Storm. So go ahead and laugh, make your jokes and point out once again how wrestling is fake. That's your opinion, and this is mine.

Skiing falls in Carnival

could not continue the streak in the giant slalom.

After the first run, his time of 46.60 seconds led the closest competitor by almost a full second, but then the law of probability struck.

Gibson, making an effort to close the door on the rest of the competition, momentarily lost control of his skis and glided away from the gate.

Showing class, he hiked up to the gate and made sure he went through so he could continue and have his time count toward the qualifying time. He finished in 34th place.

This action was important due to the fact that the team had already lost Nick Kulkarni and Gideon Silverstein in the first run.

Kulkarni had by the far the most violent day of the competitors at Ascutney. His spectacular helicopter crash during the slalom race left onlookers worried and amazed.

And if that wasn't enough during his first run of the Giant Slalom, he caught his arm on the third gate from the bottom and lost control. While he was balancing on one leg he tried to regain control but did not.

He ended up in a heap on the side of the course. Usually a top 20 finisher, and coming off a banner race last week, (12th in Giant Slalom and ninth in Slalom) his time was missed.

Freshman Nick Nacca had a strong second run in the Giant Slalom, helping to prevent a disaster with a time of 47.44 to finish at a respectable 1:40.23. Jonathan Gray, Jay Robbins, and Marc Epstein finished 27th, 15th 31st respectively.

When senior Chris Pomeroy of Winthrop went down it became necessary for rookie Patrick Bachant (21st) to finish the race and ski cautiously, yet, at the same time remain competitive.

The Boston College skiers were the story of this race. With this carnival being the last at Ascutney for the graduating BC seniors, there was an air of urgency at the mountain.

The BC men had three finishers in the top ten, holding spots two, six, and seven in the slalom.

Leading it to the first place finish in the Slalom was Michael Duran, who finished second. Lori Williams, a senior for BC, won the women's slalom and finished second in the giant slalom.

Williams finished slalom by almost four seconds ahead of her next opponent, B.C Junior Jennifer Runco.

The women suffered a similar fate during the Giant Slalom, with both Molly Lyon and Nikki Smith not finishing their second runs after strong first runs.

Lyon was in 10th at the time of her DNF (did not finish), Smith was in third. Carolyn Lewenberg and Caitlin Doughty resided at seventh and eighth respectively, but while Lewenberg improved on her time significantly and moved up to fourth place.

Doughty, on the other hand, did not move up in the ranks, and instead dropped to 11th. Lewenberg held control of the top spot for a brief time but soon lost it to Plymouth State's Whitney Swaffield.

How will UMass rebound? According to Coach Igor Vanovac, "Thursday morning we will be going up for special training to get an edge on the competition and take advantage of the extra practice."

Vanovac also commented on the team's morale, "The team is staying strong." The ski team has two more races until regionals.

and freshman Cindy Gonzalez were both hit hard. Butler's contact sent her to the bench for four minutes.

"We couldn't get a call," Dacko said after the game. But the first-year coach didn't blame officiating for her team's struggles.

"We were not ready to play and they took advantage of our inconsistency on the perimeter," said Dacko, who is now 24-23 in her first year with a team. "We do not play well when we are not getting assists and are out-rebounded. We came out flat and did not deserve to win the game."

With the loss, the Minutewomen slip into a tie for second place in the A-10 East with Temple, which beat La Salle 67-63 on Sunday.

The second place finish is vital for the postseason, as the top two teams in each division earn first-round byes in the A-10 Tournament, set at Rhode Island's new Ryan Center.

Yale up for opener

Freshman Camilla Knight partners Susan Hyams in the No. 3 doubles position.

The busy spring season will help these partnerships gain experience and the understanding of each other's game to see further successes throughout the coming months.

Minutewomen coach Judy Dixon will be entering her 11th season this spring with a vast tennis history. The former doubles partner of Billie Jean King has also competed at Wimbledon, the U.S Open and taken part in the Virginia Slims Tour. From 1973-76, Dixon was head coach for Yale.

"I am looking forward to the season if everyone is healthy," Dixon said. "If we have full strength and no injuries we will have a strong and young team.

Depontes returns to action on Feb. 21 against Army. Dixon is keen to get her back into action against Army to prepare her for the A-10.

Stephanie Price has a reoccurring strain to her inner thigh muscle but this is a problem that does not weigh too heavily on Dixon's mind. "The team has been practicing well and playing matches amongst themselves."

It is the competition that the Minutewomen need to go into the A-10 Conference fully prepared. "We are gearing up for the Atlantic 10. Last time we were out of the top four due to a tough year so our goal is to get back into the elite of the Atlantic 10," Dixon said.

The Yale Bulldogs enter their spring season with confidence. They finished their fall season by beating a strong Princeton team to capture the 2002 ECAC Team Championships.

"We have a great out-of-conference schedule that will prepare us for Ivy League play. I believe in challenging the players to raise their level of play during the season, we will only improve as a team playing good competition," Yale coach Chad Skorupka said.

The Minutewomen are going into their first game of the season in a realistic and confident mode. Captain Hyams said, "We are going into the [Yale] game to win points for the team." Price added, "We are excited about playing Yale because we haven't played in a long while."

Dixon concluded, "Yale is the strong team. Intensity and match toughness is important to see what we can do against Army."

The season will be concluded at the three-day 2002 Verizon Atlantic 10 Tournament to be held in Baltimore, Md. beginning on April 17.

Bonnies topple UMass

Drop Minutewomen into tie for second

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team suffered the classic "trap game" syndrome, and dropped a conference game to St. Bonaventure, 56-50, Sunday in Atlantic 10 play at the Reilly Center in Olean, N.Y.

Just three weeks after blowing out the Bonnies (6-14, 3-6 A-10) at the Mullins Center, 70-48, the Minutewomen (12-9, 5-3 A-10) were the inferior team, possibly lost in looking ahead to Thursday's matchup with A-10 West leader George Washington.

St. Bona	56
UMass	50

St. Bonaventure used several key runs down the stretch to fend off a struggling Minutewoman squad that stayed in the game, but couldn't grab a lead.

The Bonnies were led by senior Courtney Mattingly, who scored 13 points and grabbed 11 rebounds, all on the defensive end. Sophomore Caitlin Crist chipped in 14 points.

UMass had only two scorers in double digits. Seniors Jennifer Butler and Ebony Pegues dropped 16 and 11 points, respectively. Butler continued her dominance on the boards with 14 rebounds, for her 17th double-double of the season.

In the end, UMass was hard pressed to start a rally and keep the Bonnies out of the basket.

St. Bonaventure held the lead for the entire second half, and kept the advantage with solid counter-attacking, while the Minutewomen were unable to start a successful run.

Butler, as expected, provided some spark, first grabbing a key rebound with less than eight minutes to go, and then following up with a basket to bring the Minutewomen to within a bucket.

Butler had a chance to tie things up just a minute later, when she went to the line for a one-and-one. But after hitting the first shot, she missed the second, and St. Bonaventure countered quickly back down the court and edged the score to 45-41.

The Bonnies had another close call just a few minutes earlier when the Minutewomen went on a 9-0 run over 2:40, and after a few minutes of back-and-forth shooting, brought them to within one on an Ebony Pegues basket. St. Bonaventure never let its lead slip away through the rest of the half, and eventually ran away to the final.

Both squads played a very sloppy first half, and the Minutewomen tied the game at 18 on a Judit Zsedenyi 3-pointer with 4:17 to go.

St. Bonaventure made its biggest move of the game, though, when it went on a 10-0 run to close out the half, capped by a last-second banked 3-pointer from junior Becky Valenti. The buzzer shot sent the teams into the locker room with the Bonnies up 28-18.

"We came out flat," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "The Bonnies were more aggressive on the boards."

The Maroon and White was outrebounded 42-38, and shot just 21.4 percent from the field in the first half. The second half saw the Minutewomen improve their mark slightly, to 33.3 percent.

Meanwhile, the Bonnies were solid from the field, and went to the foul line 25 times, converting on 18.

UMass went to the line 20 times, but Dacko thought it should have been more, especially when Butler

Tennis will open without Depontes

By Anna Edwards
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team begins the spring season today when it faces Yale in New Haven, Conn. without its key player, Jafra Depontes.

It marks the start of a busy season for the Minutewomen with a further 18 matches scheduled, including six in Amherst.

The Minutewomen can enter this forthcoming season with confidence. Sophomore Sasha Edelstein, who has an International Tennis Federation ranking of 240, had a 5-1 singles record for Fall 2002. This meant that she was undefeated at the No. 1 singles position.

Edelstein was awarded the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for the week of Sept. 16.

Edelstein's level of play was of a high standard during the Fall when she got to the final of the Eastern Collegiate Women's Championship on Sept. 15.

Although beaten in the Championship final by Milena Matijevic of Niagara (2-6, 0-6). Her successes can only put her in a dominating position for the coming spring.

Awards also went to sophomore Stephanie Price who achieved the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week and A-10 Performer of the Week (Sept. 16) honors for the fall season.

Price, who enters the spring season with a 7-1 record, feels that the team is focused and prepared for its matches.

"The team's goals are to get first and second position at the Atlantic 10 Conference, preferably first," which begins on April 17. She went on to add the team's main aim was to "win the close matches from last year."

Depontes returns to competition after she failed to compete during the fall season due to shoulder surgery. Depontes' presence in the spring schedule has had nothing but a positive effect on the team.

"Getting back Jafra will add depth to the team," junior captain Susan Hyams said. Depontes may be the ingredient necessary to increase the Minutewomen's success against teams that closely defeated them in the fall.

However, missing the previous season may have hampered her level of play.

Having a stronger team is not the only reason why the Minutewomen are feeling confident.

"Competition this spring is tougher but the team is feeling stronger and playing better than in the fall," Hyams said. The level of fitness is also an incentive for the Maroon and White.

"The aim is to get healthy and get to know each other and build friendships within the team," Price added. This attitude can only have a positive effect mentally on the team.

There are also key players representing the Minutewomen in doubles. Edelstein and freshman Dorothy Iwanowicz team up in the No. 2 position.

Ski teams struggle in Vermont

By Art Jankelowitz
Collegian Correspondent

BROWNSVILLE, Vt. – The rest of the MacConnel Conference has been trying to find a way to defeat junior Beau Gibson, but today they didn't have to. Trying to ensure the Minutemen a victory in the giant slalom, Gibson lost an edge and was left to hike back up the hill. His finish in 54th place, marked the first time since the UMass Carnival at Berkshire East, that he finished lower than second.

Gibson saw his three-race streak of finishing first end, and watched Mt. Woutnes, nicknamed the "White Monster," in the Carnival staff, humble the Massachusetts men's and women's ski team this past weekend.

The Boston College Carnival, based at the Brownsville, Vt., resort was not kind to UMass.

Six UMass skiers did not finish the giant slalom and five did not finish the slalom.

In the slalom, the men finished fourth overall, while the women finished third. And if the theme of this past weekend's sports was the Boston Massacre, then the Eagles joined Temple, UMass-Lowell, and Boston University in playing the part of the British.

During the slalom race, Gibson claimed the top spot finishing with a time of 1:33.67.

That marked his third victory in as many races, but he

Last team event brings questions for Lafrieniere

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's track team traveled to Dartmouth last weekend for its last full team event of the regular season and proved a few things while leaving some questions unanswered.

"It was a mixed bag," coach Julie Lafrieniere said.

"We had some good performances and some not so good," she added.

Overall the Minutewomen came in second in the six-team meet with a team score of 134 1/2.

Dartmouth claimed its home competition with 185 total points clinching a decisive victory over the rest of the field. Williams, UMass-Lowell, Keene State, and RPI rounded out the rest of the competition respectively.

The Maroon and White was led by junior ECAC qualifier Brandy Green and former Dinn Brother's Athlete of the Week, Christina Huff.

The two combined for a total of 39 1/2 of the team's overall points and won three of the four events in which it competed.

Green set a personal indoors record in the pole vault competition, clearing the bar at 12 feet and placing first in the event.

Green carried her success over, the 60 meter hurdles with a time of 9.21 seconds.

Huff had similar success in her events with her top achievement being a first place finish in the 200 meters.

She also came in second in the 60 meter dash with a 7.79 second finish and was a part of the third place relay team.

A lot of the times were skewed due to the very nice, but very slow Dartmouth track.

"It was good for the straight away runs, but the distance runs went slower," Lafrieniere said. "It was a very flat track."

This did not stop the Minutewomen from dominating the longest distance run of the competition, the 5000 meter.

"We racked up a lot of points here," Lafrieniere said of the 5000 meter.

The Maroon and White took the top three spots and was led by senior captain Julie McGee who beat out fellow Minutewomen Amanda Dahlberg and Tricia Silva.

McGee finished way ahead of the pack with time of 18:28.53.

The lack of junior Shannon Jackson, sidelined for the competition, took a bit of a toll on the Maroon and White.

Jackson is one of the more consistent scorers on the squad and gives depth in the relay and hurdle events.

A factor that has Lafrieniere concerned going into the A-10 Championships.

Coach Lafrieniere was impressed with her team in some aspects, but expects more from her mid range runners.

"We don't have a lot of depth... we only have one more weekend to sharpen up," Lafrieniere said.

That is until the Maroon and White take on the upcoming challenge of the A-10 Championships which features strong squads from Rhode Island, LaSalle and Saint Joseph's.

Each of these teams has exhibited significant depth in their midrange department, posing a definite threat.

This coming weekend, the Maroon and White will go out to Boston without a full squad and will be gunning to gain some better times.

Lafrieniere hopes to get her team on the right foot before attacking its most daunting task of the season.

"We need to get a few people back on the right track," Lafrieniere said. "No pun intended."

Allery sets school record as swim teams split against BC

By Nick Wright
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts swimming and diving teams split their final meet of the season against Boston College on Saturday. The Minutemen were victorious, 183-117, while the Minutewomen were defeated, 175-123.

There were two standout performances for the Maroon and White. Senior Kate Allery set a new school record in the one-meter dive against the Eagles with a score of 288.45 points.

This score beat the previous school record, held by Allery, of 287.02 points which she set her junior year. More importantly, with the Atlantic 10 Championships looming, her performance propelled her to rank No. 1 in the conference for the event.

Allery also placed first in the three-meter dive against Boston College with a total of 260.47 points. Her combined efforts in the two diving events was enough to see her named the women's Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Performer of the Week for the second time this season.

Allery also picked up this honor for the week ending Jan. 19.

Sophomore Dylan Smith completed a clean sweep of the A-10 awards for the Maroon and White when he was named the men's A-10 Swimming and Diving Performer of the Week for his success against the Eagles.

Smith was victorious in the 100- and 200-yard butterfly events in times of 51.68 seconds and 1:54.29, respectively. His time in the shorter event was a season's best.

Smith was also part of the victorious 200-yard medley relay team, which also contained seniors Chad Arnold, Justin Houck and junior Peter Tawczynski. The foursome won in a time of 1:36.44.

Other victories for the Minutemen, who stopped the Eagles from winning their seventh dual meet in succession, came courtesy of Tawczynski in the 100-yard backstroke (58.70 seconds).

Sophomore Brandon Doane placed first in two events, the one-meter dive with a total of 264.60 points and the 200-yard backstroke (1:55.52).

Junior Logan Alomar won the three-meter dive (280.95 points) and a quartet of seniors, Arnold, Ryan Zaucha, Tommy Keane and Rob Bellamy won the 400-yard freestyle relay in a time of 3:05.02.

For the Minutewomen, there were four other victories on the day against the Eagles.

Senior Lizzy Boyle claimed two wins in the 50-yard freestyle in 24.97 seconds and the 100-yard backstroke in a time of 1:00.42. Junior Christen Dexter place first in the 100-yard breaststroke (1:08.34).

The final victory for the Maroon and White came from fellow junior Diana Alberti in the 200-yard butterfly in a time of 2:10.

Both teams now have a weekend off before their seasons culminate with the Atlantic 10 Championships which take place from Feb. 20-22 in Buffalo, N.Y.

Senator Kerry to undergo surgery for prostate cancer

By Ron Fournier and Lauran Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry announced Tuesday he will undergo surgery to remove his cancerous prostate, pledging to beat the disease and "get on with the campaign."

"I am lucky," Kerry said. "I'm going to be cured."

Kerry, 59, the junior senator from Massachusetts, said he was diagnosed with an early stage of cancer and would return to work in a matter of days.

Dr. Patrick Walsh, urology chief at The Johns Hopkins Hospital who pioneered a safer form of prostate removal, will perform the surgery Wednesday morning. In a telephone interview arranged by the Kerry campaign, Walsh said the patient has "a very early, curable" form of cancer.

"I look forward to going in tomorrow morning early and getting it done and getting on with the campaign," Kerry said at a Capitol Hill news conference. "I'm confident about my capabilities to get on with the campaign."

The surgery complicates Kerry's bid to win the Democratic presidential nomination but, with the first voting still 11 months away, aides characterized the disease as a minor setback. The candidate did not seem entirely comfortable with the topic, rarely using the word "cancer" and waiting several minutes into the news conference to describe the diagnosis.

Kerry has not formally announced his presidential plans. The news conference may have been the biggest event of his political career thus far, introducing him to many Americans who know little about his 19-year Senate career spent largely in the shadow of fellow Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy.

Kerry has made strides against his five rivals in a Democratic field that could grow in the next several weeks. Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., who may enter the race after recovering from heart surgery, called Kerry to wish him well.

Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Rep. Richard Gephardt of Missouri also telephoned Kerry before the news conference. Former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, the only doctor in the race, said in a statement, "I have every confidence that he'll come through this well."

Well-wishers included President Bush, who Kerry hopes to oust in 2004. "The president wishes him the best of health," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

"This is like a bolt from the blue, completely shocking," said Massachusetts Democratic Party Chairman Phil Johnston.

Kerry began the news conference with a joke about his standoffish reputation, saying he was having his "aloof gland" removed, but he bristled over suggestions that in recent days he has denied being sick. Kerry stressed that he wanted to announce his diagnosis "on my terms."

Kerry, whose father died of prostate cancer while he was in his 80s, was diagnosed at a fairly young age. The senator has at least a 95 percent chance of being cured, Kerry's doctor said, citing his own newly published study of 2,000 patients who have undergone surgery.

About 220,000 men will be diagnosed with prostate cancer this year, and 28,900 will die, the American Cancer Society estimates. It is the second-leading cancer killer of men behind lung cancer, and risk increases with each decade of age beyond 50. But caught early, it is highly curable.

Surgery is the most common treatment for prostate cancer that has not yet spread beyond the doughnut-shaped gland that surrounds the urethra, but it is a rigorous operation that will keep Kerry in the hospital for about three days.

Kerry is among a long list of public figures diagnosed with prostate cancer, including retired Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf, former Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., New York Yankees manager Joe Torre and former Sen. Bob Dole, the 1996 Republican presidential nominee.

Dole managed to wage a vigorous campaign five years after his surgery, but former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani abandoned his plans to run for the Senate in 2000 after being diagnosed with the disease.

"If indeed the tumor is confined to the prostate gland and they don't find any evidence of spread at the time of surgery, then there's a strong likelihood that he'll remain cancer-free," Dr. Durado Brooks, the American Cancer Society's prostate cancer director, said after being told of Kerry's exam results.

A routine checkup in December uncovered a slight increase in a prostate specific antigen. Given his family history, doctors performed a biopsy at Massachusetts General Hospital and Kerry learned on Christmas Eve that he had what Walsh called a small, early stage cancer.

Phoenix Games: The new hub for University gamers

By Tom Brennan
Collegian Correspondent

The fliers are all over: "Girls Love Geeks", "FREE BEER ...is pretty cool" and "this space left intentionally blank." Since the spring semester started these neon colored flyers have been everywhere from the dorms to classrooms to the Campus Center announcing the presence of Phoenix Games, a new gaming enthusiasts store located on Route 116 in Sunderland.

Started this past November by Michael Whitehouse, a recent University of Massachusetts graduate from the Economics Department, Phoenix Games was the result of a fruitless job search. Whitehouse spent months interviewing with prospective employers during his last semester at UMass, but frustrated by a thinning job market, he soon realized he'd be better off doing his own thing. So, with graduation fast approaching in May of 2002, he started to research the gaming industry and began to look for a home for what he hoped would be a new store. He had his eye on one specific location. It was a store front in the Sunderland Shopping Center, which houses 7-11, Frontier Pizza and Java Hut among others.

"I used to live in Squire Village and my friends and I would always walk by and say, 'That would be a great place to open a gaming store,' Whitehouse said. "The location is perfect. Three apartment complexes within walking distance, a bus stop right in front of the store, a pizza place almost right next-door and it's away from the congestion and high rents of downtown Amherst. We couldn't have found a better place."

But what about the games? Phoenix has them all. From Brawl, a real time card game that can last as little as thirty seconds, to Diplomacy, a vintage strategy game that even John F. Kennedy Jr. played, which can last up to fifteen hours, Whitehouse's store gives gamers plenty to choose from. Of course, the store gets most of its business from the fans of today's most popular games, such as Settlers of Catan, World of Darkness, Dungeons & Dragons and Magic: The Gathering. It's these titles that take up the bulk of the store's nine hundred square feet of space. But the shelves don't exclude the classics. They even carry traditional games like Monopoly, Scrabble and Chess.

Phoenix Games also boasts the only year round garb and armor shop in Massachusetts. The clothing is Renaissance style and can be custom made with no difficulty. Phoenix Games offers them in purple velvet and darker colored wools like green and black. They also have kirtles, which is a woman's medieval dress.

There is attire available for men as well including tunics, doublets and jerkins (all men's medieval shirts), which can be purchased in a variety of fabrics and colors. Phoenix also has handcrafted leather and plate mail armor available as well.

The advantage to Phoenix Games opening in Sunderland is that it gives the local gaming community somewhere to go. Whitehouse knew that although there were similar stores in Greenfield (Griffon Games) and Northampton (The Space Crime Continuum), neither was in the immediate vicinity of Amherst. Whitehouse felt that an area including a university of 18,000 students should have a store of its own.

"A gaming store can help serve as a center for gamers in the area," Whitehouse said. "We hope Phoenix Games will provide this."

True to his word, Whitehouse has sectioned off part of the store for gatherings and is hosting a different event every day of the week except Wednesday. There's Vampire: The Masquerade on Mondays and WizKids night on Tuesday while Saturday is left open to any gamer who wants to use the space.

So why, in an age when Sony PlayStation and high tech digital graphics are all the rage, would anyone want to play these role-playing games?

"I think these games have more to offer than computer games," Whitehouse explained. "Like human interaction."

Whitehouse thinks that computers have taken some of the social aspects out of college life. "People think, why go to the Blue Wall when you can just sit home and IM someone?"

There are other advantages as well. Gamers don't need to wait for the latest video graphics card to produce results their imagination can create instantly. Nor do they need a $2000 computer to play these games.

A typical night at the bar for a UMass student would easily pay for a game and Whitehouse thinks it would be money better spent. In the end, he sees his games as an alternative to the usual partying that college kids are a part of.

"Usually a night of gaming," Whitehouse said. "Doesn't end up with someone crouched over a toilet."

SGA to discuss increase in University fees

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Issues of budget cuts and fee increases will be a topic of conversation at tonight's Student Government Association Senate meeting.

Concerns over a recent report in The Boston Globe and The Daily Hampshire Gazette have left members of the SGA questioning the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

"There is going to be a lot of talk about recent articles printed in The Globe over the increases in UMass student tuition," Speaker Dan Saunders said. "Our increases are the highest in the country. This also included that we have the lowest number of grant aid in the country as well."

A recent study by the National Center for Public Policy and Higher Education stated that the tuition and fees of UMass had increased by 24 percent in the 2002-2003 fiscal year. The study also revealed a 24 percent decrease in grant aid as well, both of which are the lowest in the nation.

Members of the SGA also noted that despite minimal budget cuts this fiscal year, next year is looking to be worse.

"5.1 million dollars was cut a few weeks ago, but this won't be making a large impact on student's lives," Saunders said. "Right now what we're really looking to is next year's budget because it sounds like it's going to be rough and we should be hearing more about it soon."

Despite downsides in fee increases and budget cuts, Saunders expressed hope. Saunders explained that the University is lucky due to the proactive attitude of recently inaugurated Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

"Chancellor Lombardi seems really efficient in fund raising and getting different private organizations involved," Saunders said. "The only problem with private funding is they often times are geared towards specific departments. There is a Trustee's meeting today that Bill Powers [Student Trustee] will be attending so we should be hearing more today about what is in store for UMass from him."

Aside from budget cuts and fee increases the Senate will be discussing the UMass Transit bus route once again.

A motion was passed in the fall of 2002 requesting that the UMass Transit Services begin stopping at the Continuing Education bus stop as well as the Puffton bus stop on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights. Currently the UMass Transit Services does not stop at either location after 10 p.m. on the given nights.

"I received a response from a motion we had passed requesting that the buses stop at the Continuing Education bus stop and Puffton bus stops," Saunders said. "I was told that I needed to address this issue with the Parking Transit Advisory Board. This completely underscores why we have a Senate if we make recommendations and they then get passed on to another committee. This is going to be an interesting issue that is going to raise some questions."

SGA Presidential and Student Trustee elections are also on tonight's agenda when the official dates and times are being released.

"I have heard a rumor that the elections are going to be taking place before spring break," Saunders said.

Other motions on tonight's agenda are the continuing Senate appointments as well as continuing to pass elections commissioners to the Elections Committee.

"We had a bunch of stuff on last weeks agenda so this week has been pretty quiet as far as I've seen," Saunders said. "But a lot of people have stuff to discuss so it should be interesting."

The Senate will convene at the Top of the Campus Center tonight at 7 p.m. All meetings are open to the public.

Career Fair to be held today in S.U. Ballroom

BY SARA-MEGAN WALSH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Searching for the ideal job after college or curious what jobs each major has to offer? At the Annual Campus Wide Career Fair at the Campus Center Auditorium today from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., those questions can be answered.

Any student, no matter their major, can find various opportunities for employment among 65 employers attending the Career Fair.

Employers represented at the fair will range from large multinational employers such as Verizon and the Internal Revenue Service to local employers including Massachusetts Police departments. In addition the companies are looking for people in all areas and majors. For example, Hertz, a rent-a-car corporation, recruits not only engineering and management majors, but those majoring in exercise science and recreation.

Undergraduates shouldn't be discouraged from browsing through the Career Fair. Campus Career Services encourages undergraduate students to browse through the Fair so they can discover what jobs are out there in their areas of interest.

People of all classes would benefit from attending Career Fairs, stressed Kim Holloway from Career Services. "If by the time you're a senior you've already attended several fairs and know what to expect from them, you'll be more relaxed and therefore better able to communicate effectively with employers."

Career services also advised students to bring several copies of their resumes if they are looking for employment and an open mind to different possibilities.

Outside of the Annual Campus-Wide Career Fair, Career Services will be hosting several smaller events on Feb. 12. Between the hours of 5:30 and 7:30 p.m., a Nursing job fair will be held in the Campus Auditorium with employers from hospitals, clinics and health care facilities.

A few hours later from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m., an ALANA (African, Latino, Asian and Native American) job fair will offer employment opportunities for ALANA students featuring employers looking to diversify their current workforce.

For those not sure what they are looking for, a co-op and Summer Job Fair is planned for Feb. 13 from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. This will allow students to search for internships and co-ops among over 30 employers including Hewlett Packard, NBC TV, and the U.S. Corps of Engineers.

At the same time, a Summer Camp Employment Day will be held, featuring day camps searching for University students as employees during the summer months.

Powell says NATO at risk if alliance fails to deal properly with Iraq crisis

BY BARRY SCHWEID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – Addressing a historic rift within NATO, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Tuesday the future of the 53-year-old military alliance is at risk if it fails to confront the crisis with Iraq.

Distressed by the refusal of three U.S. allies to agree to bolster Turkey's defenses, Powell told the Senate Budget Committee that it is not the United States that is fracturing NATO by seeking support for the option of war to disarm Iraq.

"The alliance is breaking itself up because it will not meet its responsibilities," Powell said in response to a suggestion by Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., that the Bush administration was "barreling in" to get Iraqi President Saddam Hussein over the objections of allies, Russia and China.

Reflecting widespread skepticism among members of Congress, Hollings said Iraq "is not an immediate threat" and advised Powell "to be a little bit more deliberate" in dealing with other nations about Iraq.

Powell rebutted that "this is the time to deal with this regime, once and for all," as he said it strengthens its ties to al-Qaida and other terror groups.

He told the committee that what appeared to be a new statement from al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden shows why the world needs to be wary of Iraqi ties to terrorists.

Powell said he had read a transcript of "what bin Laden – or who we believe to be bin Laden" was saying on the al-Jazeera Arab satellite station Tuesday. "Once again he speaks to the people of Iraq and talks about their struggle and how he is in partnership with Iraq," Powell said.

As broadcast later, the voice purporting to be bin Laden's urged Iraqis to confront any U.S.-led invasion with camouflaged trenches and suicide bombings.

"With all the might of the enemy, they were unable to defeat us" in Afghanistan, the speaker said. "We hope that our brothers in Iraq will do the same as we did."

Al-Qaida and Iraq, the speaker indicated, are bound by a common hatred of the United States.

On another front, President Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, met in New York with chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix. They discussed the inspection process, a senior U.S. official said.

Blix and atomic weapons inspector Mohamed ElBaradei are to report to the Security Council on Friday on their search for weapons of mass destruction.

Powell, in his testimony to the Senate committee, said, "This nexus between terrorists and states that are developing weapons of mass destruction can no longer be looked away from and ignored."

The split between the United States and its trans-Atlantic allies widened Monday when France, Germany and Belgium blocked a U.S.-backed measure to authorize NATO to make plans to protect Turkey if Iraq were to attack. Russia then joined France and Germany in demanding strengthened weapons inspections.

Powell told the committee the United States was engaged in intensive diplomacy to reverse the three nations' action. In any event, he said, the Bush administration and other NATO members would help Turkey with defensive equipment.

He said he hoped NATO "would do the right thing in the next 24 hours."

At NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, the administration suffered another setback Tuesday when France, Germany and Belgium held to their positions. And Chinese President Jiang Zemin, in a telephone call to French President Jacques Chirac, backed extending U.N. weapons inspections as the preferred way to deal with disarming Iraq.

Powell said the United States would maintain pressure on the U.N. Security Council to back the use of force as an option. "It is clear a moment of truth is coming for the Security Council," he said.

Meanwhile, Sen. John W. Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Congress may consider reducing financial support for NATO.

Bush, meanwhile, continued on a path of intensive diplomacy, urging support for his hard line against Saddam in telephone conversations with Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and British Prime Minister Tony Blair. Angola is a member of the Security Council and shares Bush's view that Saddam must disarm. White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

Powell, reaching for support in the Arab world, assured the Egyptian newspaper Al-Ahram that "the U.S. has no hate list. The U.S. does not look for countries to hate."

In fact, he said in an interview Monday released by the State Department on Tuesday, "the U.S. looks for friends and partners, and most of the nations in the Arab world are our friends and partners."

Powell praised Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak as a wise leader and said the Bush administration would welcome Arab leaders approaching Saddam to urge him to comply with U.N. disarmament resolutions.

Career Fair to be held today in S.U. Ballroom

BY SARA-MEGAN WALSH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Searching for the ideal job after college or curious what jobs each major has to offer? At the Annual Campus-Wide Career Fair at the Campus Center Auditorium today from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. those questions can be answered.

Any student, no matter their major, can find various opportunities for employment among 65 employers attending the Career Fair.

Employers represented at the fair will range from large national employers such as Verizon and the Internal Revenue Service to local employers including Massachusetts Police departments. In addition the companies are looking for people in all areas and majors. For example Hertz a rent-a-car corporation, recruits not only engineering and management majors but those majoring in exercise science and education.

Undergraduates shouldn't be discouraged from browsing through the Career Fair. Campus Career Services encourages undergraduate students to browse through the fair so they can discover what jobs are out there in their areas of interest.

"People of all classes would benefit from attending Career Fairs," stressed Kim Holloway from Career Services. "If by the time you're a senior you've already attended several fairs and know what to expect from them, you'll be more relaxed and therefore better able to communicate effectively with employers."

Career services also advised students to bring several copies of their resumes if they are looking for employment and an open mind to different possibilities.

Out-side of the Annual Campus-Wide Career Fair, Career Services will be hosting several smaller events on Feb. 12. Between the hours of 5:30 and 7:30 p.m., a Nursing job fair will be held in the Campus Auditorium with employers from hospitals, clinics and health care facilities.

A few hours later from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m., an ALANA (African, Latino, Asian and Native American) job fair will offer employment opportunities for ALANA students featuring employers looking to diversify their current workforce.

For those not sure what they are looking for, a co-op and Summer Job Fair is planned for Feb. 13 from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. This will allow students to search for internships and co-ops among over 30 employers including Hewlett Packard, NBC TV, and the U.S. Corps of Engineers.

At the same time, a Summer Camp Employment Day will be held, featuring day camps searching for University students as employees during the summer months.

Powell says NATO at risk if alliance fails to deal properly with Iraq crisis

BY BARRY SCHWEID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) Addressing a historic rift within NATO, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Tuesday the future of the 53-year-old military alliance is at risk if it fails to confront the crisis with Iraq.

Distressed by the refusal of three U.S. allies to agree to bolster Turkey's defenses, Powell told the Senate Budget Committee that it is not the United States that is fracturing NATO by seeking support for the option of war to disarm Iraq.

"The alliance is breaking itself up because it will not meet its responsibilities," Powell said in response to a suggestion by Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., that the Bush administration was "barreling in" to get Iraqi President Saddam Hussein over the objections of allies, Russia and China.

Reflecting widespread skepticism among members of Congress, Hollings said Iraq "is not an immediate threat" and advised Powell "to be a little bit more deliberate" in dealing with other nations about Iraq.

Powell rebutted that "this is the time to deal with this regime, once and for all," as he said it strengthens its ties to al-Qaida and other terror groups.

He told the committee that what appeared to be a new statement from al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden shows why the world needs to be wary of Iraq ties to terrorists.

Powell said he had read a transcript of "what bin Laden — or who we believe to be bin Laden" was saying on the al-Jazeera Arab satellite station Tuesday. "Once again he speaks to the people of Iraq and talks about their struggle and how he is in partnership with Iraq," Powell said.

As broadcast later, the voice purporting to be bin Laden's urged Iraqis to confront any U.S.-led invasion with camouflaged trenches and suicide bombings.

"With all the might of the enemy, they were unable to defeat us" in Afghanistan, the speaker said. "We hope that our brothers in Iraq will do the same as we did."

Al-Qaida and Iraq, the speaker indicated, are bound by a common hatred of the United States.

On another front, President Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, met in New York with chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix. They discussed the inspection process, a senior U.S. official said.

Blix and atomic weapons inspector Mohamed ElBaradei are to report to the Security Council on Friday on their search for weapons of mass destruction.

Powell, in his testimony to the Senate committee, said, "This nexus between terrorists and states that are developing weapons of mass destruction can no longer be looked away from and ignored."

The split between the United States and its trans-Atlantic allies widened Monday when France, Germany and Belgium blocked a U.S.-backed measure to authorize NATO to make plans to protect Turkey if Iraq were to attack. Russia then joined France and Germany in demanding strengthened weapons inspections.

Powell told the committee the United States was engaged in intensive diplomacy to reverse the three nations' action. In any event, he said, the Bush administration and other NATO members would help Turkey with defensive equipment.

He said he hoped NATO "would do the right thing in the next 24 hours."

At NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, the administration suffered another setback Tuesday when France, Germany and Belgium held to their positions. And Chinese President Jiang Zemin, in a telephone call to French President Jacques Chirac, backed extending U.N. weapons inspections as the preferred way to deal with disarming Iraq.

Powell said the United States would maintain pressure on the U.N. Security Council to back the use of force as an option. "It is clear a moment of truth is coming for the Security Council," he said.

Meanwhile, Sen. John W. Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Congress may consider reducing financial support for NATO.

Bush, meanwhile, continued on a path of intensive diplomacy, urging support for his hard line against Saddam in telephone conversations with Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and British Prime Minister Tony Blair. Angola is a member of the Security Council and shares Bush's view that Saddam must disarm. White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

Powell, reaching for support in the Arab world, assured the Egyptian newspaper Al-Ahram that "the U.S. has no hate list. The U.S. does not look for countries to hate."

In fact, he said in an interview Monday released by the State Department on Tuesday, "the U.S. looks for friends and partners, and most of the nations in the Arab world are our friends and partners."

Powell praised Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak as a wise leader and said the Bush administration would welcome Arab leaders approaching Saddam to urge him to comply with U.N. disarmament resolutions.

EDITORIAL OPINION

The war in Iraq: celebrities and religous leaders hold unique clout

A Vatican envoy touched down in Baghdad Tuesday, adding to the growing number of voices crying out against a looming war with Iraq, and adding the pope to the spotlight list of people against the war.

The envoy, who claims to be coming to Iraq "in the spirit of Abraham," is reportedly bringing a personal message from the pope to Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. Both Catholicism and Islam believe that Abraham was a prophet of God and Muslims believe that Mohammad is a direct descendent of Abraham's.

This latest plea for peace carries a new kind of clout. The secular responses we've seen so far have carried different messages. Celebrities, politicians, foreign officials and other pundits who have spoken out against invading Iraq have done so for political, economic or pacific reasons.

The appeals up until now have either been purely secular in nature – pro-peace, anti-war etc. – or if religious, they have been from Muslim leaders worldwide.

This religious message crosses all these lines. Muslims and Catholics, historically, have not been best of friends. The conflicts between Muslim countries and Christian and secular countries throughout the centuries have been markedly tragic, violent and drawn out.

So for the Vatican, a traditionally stubborn and seldom-its-way political force, to move beyond this history shows some commitment to the message they bring. Cardinal Roger Etchegaray's message that "war cannot be the last solution" rings true with those arguing for peace, and agreeing with the Catholic Church has not always been the most popular path.

Joining the pope as well-knowns against the war has been a rash of celebrities who are standing against the Bush administration and the pressure for military action.

This week South Africa native and music mainstay Dave Matthews posted his letter for peace on his website and it found its way across the internet.

"Surely it is more likely that an attack on Iraq would only strengthen Al Qaeda by feeding Anti-American sentiment. Putting out the fire with gasoline, so to speak. It is certainly not to liberate the people of Iraq who suffer under Hussein's rule, unless we call killing hundreds of thousands of Iraqis liberation," said Matthews in the letter.

Several months ago, Television war veteran Mike Farrell, who starred on the Korean War comedy MASH, championed a group of actors against military action. Sean Penn has purchased column inches in The New York Times and used the ad space to print his opinions against the war. Similarly, former Penn cohort Madonna has joined the pacifist movement against invading Iraq.

These icons often represent those who cannot speak out and be heard so readily. It is time that Bush and his cohorts listen to this popular voice and clue in to the idea that this country does not want a war.

A world of education

I am frustrated, I yelled, and yet I still failed to get the highly demanded front of the bus, but I came close with a comfortable seat in the third row. Subconsciously my eyes examined each person as they entered the bus, trying to see if anyone looked suspicious.

The first half of my senior year of high school was a particularly stressful time, touring different colleges and universities and deciding which institution would be spending my college years. My quest to find a school [illegible] junior year [illegible] was stressful for a few [illegible] parents as well. Primarily, I [illegible] to get blown up [illegible].

The bus driver is the most likely [illegible] to suicide bombings [illegible] to sniff out the people sitting [illegible] on it, but despite the fact that this was an express bus, making only a few stops in Ashdod and some in Jerusalem, I was still a bit nervous. Maybe it was because there have been dozens and dozens of suicide bombings over the past two years. Maybe it was because there are huge terrorist groups in the Palestinian territories, committed to murdering as many civilians as possible, with the goal of destroying Israel, that are continually praised as martyrs by Arafat. Perhaps it was because I was nervous about my interview in the University of Jerusalem, but for some odd reason I was tense.

Hebrew University, a campus of 20 thousand all constructed of Jerusalem stone and built on Mt. Scopus, overlooks much of Jerusalem including the old city. Surrounded by a stone wall and a metal fence, security guards armed with guns and metal detectors protect every entrance. People all over the world come to study there, from India and China, to the United States and Europe. The school also takes pride that it has a diverse body of Palestinians and Israeli students and employees.

Gilad Skolnick

I toured the magnificent campus in my t-shirt and shorts in mid-January, and entered the admissions building. This building made UMass look organized, with no one having an idea where they were, how they got there, and what was going on. The 11 a.m. daily campus tours that were promised to me by the University ended up being as mythical as our dining commons claim that they serve "food".

As I entered the Overseas Building, and eventually found a less confused person in the bureaucracy, I started to calm down and breathe. The woman looked up from her desk, informed me that she was quite sorry and if this was important for me then I could just return next week. I guess I could just miss the first week of UMass, no problem.

> "It was the end of July, at around one in the afternoon, when a bomb exploded in this very cafeteria"

After a little while of touring the impressive campus I stumbled across the cafeteria. I settled down at an empty table by the register, and stared at the food in awe. Delicious chicken cutlets, exotic salads, scrumptious potatoes, a chocolaty desert, and a bottle of mango juice totaled but only a few dollars. After a few bites, I looked up at the quiet cafeteria. An armed security guard stood outside checking everyone's backpacks and clothing with a metal detector. Students were busily cramming for their exams, chatting in between in English and Hebrew.

It was the end of July, at around one in the afternoon, when a bomb exploded in this very cafeteria, killing seven students and teachers, and injuring many more. Two of those injured died within two weeks in the hospital. Among those who died was Janis Coulter, a UMass graduate. The bomb was packed with rusty nails as usual to help inflict more damage. This cafeteria served as a meeting point or hangout spot for hundreds of students, not that different from the Bluewall at UMass. For some reason I was unable to eat anymore. It wasn't the food, which makes UMass food look like hay, but rather that the more than 600 Palestinian terror incidents that have occurred over the past two years were no longer but mere statistics in my head.

These students are just like you and I, struggling to get a good education so that they can get a decent paying job. As I looked into the cafeteria and thought about those who worked so hard to get to that point of studying in a well known University, and just lost everything because some sick people were obsessed with murdering as many people as possible to achieve their overall goal of destroying Israel, and as I thought of the teachers who had dedicated so much of their time to help students learn and understand, I lost my appetite.

I'd love there to be peace, as that is the only way that both Palestinians and Israelis can live together, but how can you negotiate with leaders who see the murdering of college students and civilians in general as an acceptable negotiating tool?

My food was tossed into the garbage bin and my self-guided tour came to an end, but I got a front seat on the bus.

Information from the Hebrew University Web Site and Foreign Ministry of Israel was used in this column.

Arrogance along the Atlantic

Regan McKendry

Remember after the terrorism attacks how the American flag was everywhere. It adorned the antennae of cars, the windows of stores, the chests of citizens across the country. It inspired pride in being an American and the will to know that no matter what happened, our morale would not be broken and our country would not be lost.

As we appear headed to war with Iraq, when I look up at the American flag, I again ponder much about the great country with which we live. I still don't know where I stand on doing battle with Saddam, nor do I intend to settle it here. I do however know that I am, always have been, and will continue to be a proud American. For this reason, I was disgusted when I recently read an article about the rise of anti-Americanism throughout Western Europe, supposedly some of our strongest allies.

There have always been people who are anti-American that are not directly enemies to our country. Some are the less fortunate, who are jealous of all this country offers, and frankly who can blame them. I thank God for being born an American and all the rights and privileges that are entitled with citizenship. Others though, like many in those countries on the other side of the Atlantic, live a free life with many of the same luxuries that we have. Yet thinking and spewing anti-American gibberish has gone from the margins into mainstream political discussion.

Gerhard Schroeder, the Chancellor of Germany, helped himself win election by proliferating views against the United States. In France, a book titled "The Big Lie" has become a bestseller. The plot of the book? It details how the terrorism attacks of seventeen months ago were not perpetrated by radical followers of Osama Bin Laden, but rather by secret right wing group of our own government. It makes so much sense, doesn't it?

France and Germany have made it perfectly clear that they don't support a war in Iraq. Britons have even pressured Tony Blair about withdrawing his support from the Bush administration. The people of these countries have a right to their opinion. However, the fact that some have claimed that if America does find weapons of mass-destruction in Iraq, that they were merely planted by the CIA, floors me, as it should all of us.

> "I'm not the biggest fan of our president for sure, but he surely shouldn't be grouped together with the Fuhrer."

Other countries don't have to support our actions, even if they are our allies. As friendly nations though, they should not question our integrity. A former member of the German government compared George W. Bush to Adolph Hitler. I'm not the biggest fan of our president for sure, but he surely shouldn't be grouped together with the Fuhrer.

Complaints abound about America's arrogance and our gluttonous, selfish way of life. Bear in mind that these are the very same people who spend exorbitant amounts of money on our movies, our music and our products. They feel totally fine insulting the very country and culture that allows them to enjoy life the way they see fit.

Over the past half-century, America has taken a proactive stance to being a power in the world, most times in pursuit of peace. This began as an opponent to the Soviet Union during the Cold War. People in France and Germany were sure glad back then to have the United States looking out for their protection. It was money from the allied world, much of it from the United States, that helped rebuild what was West Germany into a thriving nation, while East Germany floundered under Soviet rule.

In the 1910s and 30s, America held largely isolationist views, choosing to worry about its own problems rather than adding everyone else's on top. In both instances, war across the continent of Europe and beyond broke out. With all this animosity, America could very well go back to fixing its own problems (Lord knows we have plenty), and leave the European Union and other nations outside our borders to deal with issues on their own. How long do you think it would be before they came crying back looking for protection and aid? My guess is it would take less than a decade, at the most.

One of the greatest American freedoms is of course our right to free speech and along with that open thought. I find it honorable that other nations choose to question our motives into going to war with Iraq. It forces the American government to at least give its actions a second thought. I find it detestable though that other people who live a life largely dependent on the way we live ours, modeled in many instances after our very own, would be classifying our nation with some of the worst regimes the world has ever known.

Every time I look up at the Stars and Stripes, I'll still be filled with pride in our nation, regardless of what others say. I haven't been shown any reason not to be happy that I live in the United States. There is still a dignity to be had living in the land of the free. Hopefully the ignorant masses across the ocean won't tarnish that pride.

The power of history

"America has, in the lapse of nearly half a century (since its birth), without a single exception, respected the independence of other nations while asserting and maintaining her own. America goes not abroad, in search of monsters to destroy. America is the well-wisher to the freedom and independence of all. America is the champion and vindicator only of her own. The fundamental maxims of Americas policy would insensibly change from liberty to force (if America chooses to become involved in other nations domestic issues)...America might become the dictatress of the world. America would be no longer the ruler of her own spirit.. America's glory is not dominion, but liberty. Americas march is the march of the mind."

Marek Detschke

John Quincy Adams, the sixth president of the United States, wrote these words in 1821. In 1821, Adams was not being honest with himself by claiming that the United States respected the independence of other nations. I would dare to contend that Native American nations that were being brutally forced to leave their homes would argue differently.

> "The exercise of power has put us in the position of always having our interests be satisfied."

I would furthermore contend that the enslaved Afro-Americans would not agree that the United States is a well-wisher to the freedom of all.

Yet the United States is the oldest democracy on the face of the earth and was the first nation to introduce equality, justice, and the pursuit of happiness. We consider ourselves unique and better than the rest of the world. We believe that our set of values is the highest and therefore a justification for them to be implemented in other countries. The United States, the greatest nation on earth. Why wouldn't everybody want to be like us?

While thinking about this text written by Adams, that I received in my American Foreign Policy class, I become aware of how relevant this text is today. Today America is going abroad in search of monsters to destroy. America is the dictatress of the world. America is not marching with its mind. Rather it sends soldiers by the grace of George W. Bush. So how did we get to this place when we started with the ideals of Adams? The answer is simple: power has put us in the position of having the strongest military force in the world.

The exercise of power has put us in the position of always having our interests be satisfied. These interests keep our oil, clothes and food at affordable levels, so we can continue to live with high luxury standards. We must not forget that we are a democracy, the oldest democracy. In any democracy the threshold for war is very high, because the masses don't want to send their children to war. Since September 11, 2001 the threshold has been lowered and the Bush administration has used that tragic event to distract us from domestic economic woes and manipulate us in to war.

We, the last remaining superpower in the world, are on a rampage without restrictions. Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld is comparing France, Germany, Belgium and Russia to despot governments including Cuba and Libya only because they oppose the war. What will happen to the neighbors of Iraq in the region? The anger and hatred generated toward the United States could erupt into civil wars. The balance in the region will become unstable. Also what about the civilian losses on the Iraqi side? We all know the losers in a war like this are the bystanders. Saddam Hussein is a brutal dictator of a ruined country. He is not the next Adolph Hitler.

The Bush administration is only willing to attack Iraq because the risk to American soldiers is very small. Iraq is already a beaten country to which U.N. sanctions have caused more bad than good. I refuse to accept the inevitability of human loss from the sanctions and the upcoming war. Does the fire department accept that people in a burning house are doomed to die? The solution does not lie in war and sanctions, but in a moderate solution, which requires diplomacy and international supervision.

Rock in writing

Let me tell you something.

The majority of the population is dumb, ok? Let's stop lying to ourselves and pretending that it's not a valid point. Personally, I look up to people in the public eye and those with public influence to be just a tad bit smarter than your average Joe who reads Maxim everyday during his lunch break at the construction site.

With that said, being a music columnist myself and knowing that a person or two on this campus reads my opinions, I try my best to sound somewhat intelligent and prove that I have a decent grasp on what I'm talking about.

Rockin' Out

Samara Marblestone

This is not the case for Marc Weisblott, a music columnist for the New York Village Voice.

I'll tell you what happened.

One morning over winter break, I was leaving Penn Station in Manhattan, a few blocks from where I work. I picked up a Village Voice newspaper on the corner of Lexington Avenue and 33rd Street, and eagerly turned to the music section. There I found an article by Weisblott entitled "Big with the Kids: Corporate Rock-Hack Bands Nobody Over 20 Ever Heard of Rule America."

As I started to skim his words, I realized that Weisblott was incredibly, um, what's the word? Oh yeah — dumb. This man has absolutely no idea what he was talking about in this article that was printed in one of the most prominent weekly entertainment newspapers in the country.

Weisblott argued that rock bands such as Sum 41, Puddle of Mudd, Crazy Town, Papa Roach, Saliva, Audiovent, and Chevelle, are only popular among "kids" under 20 and are not even heard of by any living, breathing human being one hour over that age.

He referred to these bands as "post-postmodern rock," given the basis that bands like The Strokes, The Vines, and The Hives are "postmodern rock."

Wow. Alright, let's get this rebuttal started.

Most of the bands that Weisblott mentioned were around even before the "post-modern" rock bands were! It's awesome how he can be cool and just casually name a new movement in rock n' roll without doing any research, or letting enough time pass to do so.

Weisblott's main criticism about the bands I listed above is that they are "making out acting like they invented disorderly conduct." So, according to this music columnist, any band that appeals to a younger audience, and who likes to smash a piece of musical equipment every now and then, acts like they invented and discovered that it really gets a crowd excited when you smash your guitar on stage. Dude, almost every band displays some rage on stage! I'm sorry if you're jealous that you can't do the same at your invisible concert with your spectacular invisible band, Weisblott.

Let me just quickly show you all of the ridiculous things that Weisblott had to say about the baby rock bands he blacklisted: Sum 41 acts too wild on stage; Puddle of Mudd's hit single "Blurry" is a great song to have a "midlife" to; Crazy Town has too many tattoos; Papa Roach didn't do a good enough job as promoters in the Pepsi Blue commercials; Saliva's new songs are too mushy; the only reason why Audiovent is around is because of their blood relation with Incubus (now that pissed me off); and Chevelle is too much like The Beach Boys because the majority of the band is made up of brothers. So apparently, due to all this crap, these bands only appeal to youngsters under 20.

How about ... no!

You've heard it here, folks. That was not a selected entry from a tabloid. That was a gist of Mr. Marc Weisblott of the

Oscars 2003

The race is on

By DAVID GERMAIN
Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. – "Chicago" is striking all the right notes to become the first musical in 34 years to win the best-picture Academy Award: solid box office, a strong showing in earlier film honors and a leading 13 Oscar nominations.

Other best-picture nominees Tuesday for the 75th annual Oscars were "Gangs of New York," "The Hours," "The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers" and "The Pianist."

The film with the most nominations often takes the top Oscar, especially when its honors include key categories such as acting and directing. "Chicago" grabbed nominations for four of its stars — lead actress Renee Zellweger, supporting actresses Catherine Zeta-Jones and Queen Latifah, and supporting actor John C. Reilly — plus director Rob Marshall.

It also earned a screenplay nomination for Bill Condon, who adapted the musical from the Bob Fosse stage hit about two jailed murderesses competing for tabloid celebrity.

"Chicago" followed "Moulin Rouge" as the second straight musical to earn a best-picture nomination after a 22-year drought for the genre. The 1981 animated musical "Beauty and the Beast" was nominated for best picture, but no song-and-dance flick has won the top prize since 1968's "Oliver!"

"I can't quite imagine it happening, but I would be so honored to carry on that tradition from 'Oliver!'" said Marshall. "I grew up on movie musicals. They really were my world. I just think it's an incredible American art form that can lift you in ways that non-musicals can't."

"Gangs of New York," an 1860s tale of vengeance, trailed "Chicago" with 10 nominations, including one for director Martin Scorsese. The Virginia Woolf-related drama "The Hours" was next with nine.

Along with Zellweger, best-actress contenders were Salma Hayek as Mexican painter Frida Kahlo in "Frida"; Nicole Kidman as author Woolf in "The Hours"; Diane Lane as an adulterous wife in "Unfaithful"; and Julianne Moore as a 1950s housewife whose marriage crumbles in "Far From Heaven."

Moore also received a supporting-actress nomination for playing another troubled 1950s housewife in "The Hours."

"They're wildly diverse characters. The fact that both happened to be placed in the 1950s, I didn't even think about that when we filmed them. Except that I didn't want my hairdos to be the same," said Moore, who covered her trademark red hair with a blond wig in "Far From Heaven."

Meryl Streep was shut out in the lead-actress category for "The Hours" but did earn a supporting-actress nomination for the twisted Hollywood tale "Adaptation."

That makes her the most-nominated actor ever, with 13. She had been tied with Katharine Hepburn at 12.

"I am thrilled and honored to be nominated, and also aghast that anybody could imagine that I could surpass

Mayer proves stability with concert DVD

By DAN BOURGEOIS
Collegian Correspondent

John Mayer has come a long way in the past year. This past spring saw his major label debut skyrocket on the charts as it sold over two and a half million copies to date. "Room for Squares" was an incredible album and established him as one of the most addictive singer/songwriters on pop radio. He is a rare breed of artist that can encapsulate the thoughts and situations of college and 20-something life with brilliant simplicity and ease. This Tuesday Mayer released his first live album, which was recorded in Birmingham, Ala. on Sept. 12, 2002.

John Mayer's recorded concert, 'Any Given Thursday,' help make his tunes sound new and fresh once more.

John Mayer 'Any Given Thursday' Aware/Columbia

It brings his work on "Room for Squares" and his recently re-released "Inside Wants Out" EP to a whole other level. It may also be just the thing to cast away any doubts claiming his current success is just a flash in the pan.

The set-list is an impressive blend of 10 album tracks, two covers and three unreleased songs. The beauty of this disc is its ability to make songs that may have been played out by diehard fans sound fresh and new in some way. On top of that, the unreleased songs are just as good as, if not better than, most songs from the two previous albums.

Mayer opens the show with an intro to "3 x 5," where he asks for the audiences' acceptance back to Birmingham. "I've been gone too long/ can I still come home?" His voice is as crystal clear live as it is in his studio recordings. He doesn't waste any time breaking out "No Such Thing," getting it out of the way early – possibly an effort to give audiences what they want – but also acknowledging that the radio has

Glover and Sanchez help inspire audience

By LAUREN DEFILIPPO
Collegian Correspondent

"I am simply a cultural worker."

This is how Danny Glover, known for his career in the film industry as an actor, producer, and director, in addition to his cultural and political undertakings, described himself at a press conference early Monday evening. As he said this, to his right sat his former teacher and friend for nearly 30 years, Sonia Sanchez. Sanchez is well known for her prolific writing career, as an educator and activist. The purpose that brought these two talented people to the University of Massachusetts on a very wintry February night was, as Sanchez put it, to "engage students in a dialogue that talks about their future. Because it is their future, if you understand what I'm saying."

Various organizations co-sponsored "Responsibility of the Black Artist in the 21st Century," helping to celebrate Black History Month on the UMass campus. Sanchez later responded that coming to the University is part of what "our mission has been ... to make people walk up-right, up-right like human beings again. There has been a diminishing of that."

Sanchez, a winner of the Robert Frost Medal in poetry in 2001, spent much of early childhood moving from relative to relative after the death of her mother when she was a year old. At the age of nine, she and her sister settled with their father and his new wife in Harlem. In 1955, she graduated from Hunter College with a degree in Political Science.

A poet by genre, Sanchez was at the forefront of the Black Studies Movement and continues to be an influential force in African-American literature today. In the 1960s, she accepted a position to be a part of the first Black Studies programs in the United States at San Francisco State College. Sanchez views teaching, especially her first experiences as a professor of Black Literature as an act of rescue. "We brought them back full-circle and said here they are," she explained. "Study this. Read this. You cannot have a

The 23rd Annual Golden Raspberry Awards honor the worst in movies

Madonna sinks; Green gets fingered; Pinocchio shrinks; 'Pluto' goes for an orbit; 'Enough' with Lopez; Sandler's 'Crazy'; Boyle gets no 'Men.'

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

You know that feeling when your palms and brow are all sweaty, or that lightheadedness you get after watching a bad movie? Each year, the folks over at the Golden Raspberry Foundation select which of these stomach-turning celluloid offerings are the worst of the worst. This year's nominations for the appropriately titled Razzies are all worthy of the title for the categories they're listed in. But which one should be given the dishonoring statuette come decision day? Have no fear, your film pessimist is here.

Worst Picture:
"The Adventures of Pluto Nash"
"Crossroads"
Roberto Benigni's "Pinocchio"
"Star Wars: Episode II: Attack of the Clones"
"Swept Away"

Verdict: "Pluto Nash" I thought was given too hard a time. It may not have been stellar, but it was slightly entertaining. While it's true that seeing a gawky 40-something play the role of a child, Benigni's "Pinocchio" wasn't as bad as it could've been (although it was close). Madonna's team-up with hubby Guy Ritchie in "Swept Away" was only seen by three people (me being one of them), so that's punishment enough. Britney Spears' cannonball into the acting pool was atrocious, true, but what did you expect? No, "Star Wars: Ep. II" is the worst film of the year, as George Lucas further destroyed his famous franchise choosing to wow us with special effects over a powerful story like the original trilogy did.

Worst Actor:
Roberto Benigni/"Pinocchio"
Adriano Giannini/"Swept Away"
Eddie Murphy/"Adventures of Pluto Nash"/"I Spy" and "Showtime"
Steven Segal/"Half Past Dead"
Adam Sandler/"Adam Sandler's 8 Crazy Nights" and "Mr. Deeds"

Verdict: So much bad acting ... so hard to choose. This would have to go to Murphy, though because it's rare that an actor is able to make three super-weak movies within one year, where he plays the same exact part in all of them.

Worst Actress:
Angelina Jolie/"Life, Or Something Like It"
Jennifer Lopez/"Enough" and "Maid in Manhattan"
Madonna/"Swept Away"
Winona Ryder/"Mr. Deeds"
Britney Spears/"Crossroads"

Verdict: What was J-Lo thinking? Her performance in "Enough" was almost enough to drive us from the theatre, but she should be slapped for taking the part in "Maid In Manhattan," where she plays a hotel housekeeper. She's not exactly helping the stereotype about Hispanic women in that line of work.

Worst Supporting Actor:
Hayden Christensen/"Star Wars: Episode II"
Tom Green/"Stealing Harvard"
Freddie Prinze, Jr./"Scooby Doo"
Christopher Walken/"The Country Bears"
Robin Williams/"Death to Smoochy"

Verdict: Tom Green was the best part about the otherwise dreary comedy "Stealing Harvard," and the same goes for Williams in "Death to Smoochy." Hayden Christensen's younger Anakin, Jake Lloyd, couldn't act his way out of a pod race in the first "Episode I," so why should we expect the older one to be able to do that? But my real question is this: since when was Fred a homeboy? Prinze's part in "Scooby Doo" insults the kids like me who grew up on the show, and thus, he wins this race. Or is it loses?

Worst Supporting Actress:
Lara Flynn Boyle/"Men in Black II"
Bo Derek/"Master of Disguise"
Madonna/"Die Another Day"
Natalie Portman/"Star Wars: Episode II"
Rebecca Romijn-Stamos/"Rollerball"

Verdict: I got a kick out of all these actresses in each film eligible – not so much because they couldn't act, but more that they were so mis-cast. Why doesn't Portman's Amidala age over the past 10 years since "Episode I?" Why was Romijn-Stamos putting on an accent in "Rollerball?" Why was Bo Derek in a kid's film? Why does Madonna try to act? This one is almost a hung jury, but my gut goes with Madonna on this one.

Most Flatulent Teen-Targeted Movie: (New)
"Adam Sandler's 8 Crazy Nights"
"Crossroads"
"Jackass: The Movie"
"Scooby Doo"
"XXX"

Verdict: Am I getting old, because I don't understand this category? I don't keep track of farting in movies, and besides...I think flatulence is funny. Jury's out on this one.

Worst Screen Couple:
Adriano Giannini and Madonna/"Swept Away"
Roberto Benigni and Nicoletta Braschi/Benigni's "Pinocchio"
Hayden Christensen and Natalie Portman/ "Star Wars: Episode II"
Eddie Murphy and (either) Robert DeNiro/"Showtime" or Owen Wilson/"I Spy" or Murphy cloned/"The Adventures of Pluto Nash"
Britney Spears and whatever-his-name-was/"Crossroads"

Verdict: You gotta give the people of The Razzies credit for being funny, at the very least. What surprises me is that Benigni and real-life wife Braschi had no chemistry on screen. And with Madonna's beau behind the camera, she couldn't really put on her white trash archetype. But I haven't seen camaraderie as bad as DeNiro's and Murphy's since Howie Mandell and Fred Savage in "Little Monsters."

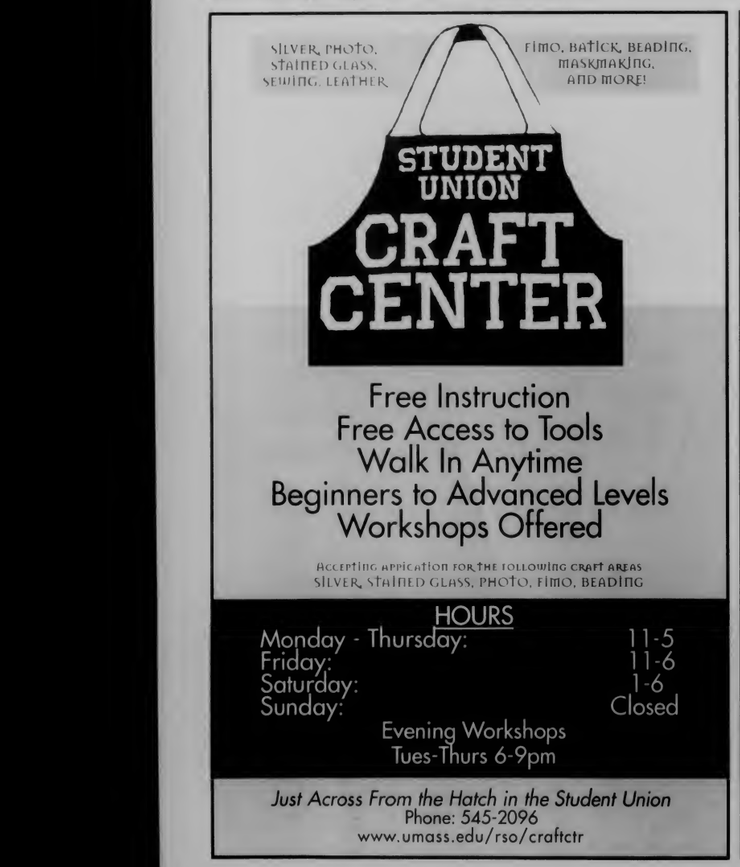
Worst Director:
Roberto Benigni/"Pinocchio"
Tamra Davis/"Crossroads"
George Lucas/ "Star Wars: Episode II"
Guy Ritchie/"Swept Away"
Ron Underwood/ "The Adventures of Pluto Nash"

Verdict: This should go to Ritchie, who gave up the bloody-good fun of films like "Lock, Stock..." and "Snatch" to remake a movie that wasn't all that great to begin with. He's learned his lesson, though (I hope). Hands down, we probably would all agree that George Lucas is the worst director of the year.

Worst Remake or Sequel:
"I Spy"
"Mr. Deeds"
Roberto Benigni's "Pinocchio"
"Star Wars: Episode II"
"Swept Away"

Verdict: "Pinocchio" was not a film that had to be made, or at the very least, could have been better thought out. You thought I was going to say "Episode II," huh? It was by no means a good movie, but it wins at least a few points for the scene where Yoda goes ballistic on Count Dooku.

Worst Screenplay:
"The Adventures of Pluto Nash"
"Crossroads"
Roberto Benigni's "Pinocchio"
"Star Wars: Episode II"
"Swept Away"



Verdict: In other awards ceremonies, like the Oscars or the Golden Globes, there is the occasional tie. There's no better category than this for that to happen. The award for the worst script (including dialogue, scene placement, etc.) is shared here. No, it doesn't go to "Pinocchio," since that was written in Italian, so I can't fairly decide if the screenplay is ultimately as bad as the movie turned out to be. For this category, it's tied between "Crossroads" (who talks like that?) and "Episode II," another reason why this movie was so stale and unemotional.

Worst Original Song:
"Die Another Day" from "Die Another Day"
"I'm Not a Girl, Not Yet a Woman" from "Crossroads"
"Overprotected" from "Crossroads"

Verdict: Wow. Britney Spears is nominated twice in one category! Ouch. As much as I'm anti-bubblegum pop, Madonna has just about worn out her welcome in the music industry, at least when it comes to movie theme songs. Yet I'm afraid she'll live to see another day where her tunes grace the credits of a movie.

Popular drag queen show reaches UMass

The Kinsey Sicks, "America's Favorite Dragapella Beauty Shop Quartet," performed at Bowker Auditorium on Saturday, Feb. 9.

By Tom Brennan
Collegian Correspondent

Everybody loves a drag queen, and judging from the crowd's reaction at Bowker Auditorium Sunday night, The Kinsey Sicks, "America's Favorite Dragapella Beauty Shop Quartet," is no exception.

Made up of Ben Schatz ("Rachel"), Irwin Keller ("Winnie"), Chris Dilky ("Trampolina") and Kevin Smith ("Trixie," a recent addition), The Kinsey Sicks has floored audiences for the past nine years. They got their start on the street corners of San Francisco's Castro District, and by 2001 were receiving critical acclaim for their Off-Broadway production "DRAGAPELLA! Starring the Kinsey Sicks," held at New York's legendary Studio 54.

Singing parodies in a barber shop vocal style, The Kinsey's are known for their high energy, though often times raunchy, shows. This night they didn't disappoint. Dressed in 50s era satin dresses, complete with white gloves, this mischievous foursome (funny, you wouldn't know it by looking at them...) made smooth transitions from songs about Jewish cynicism to HIV medication. Their tongue in cheek humor coupled with perfect harmonies kept an eager audience wondering what shameless skit was coming next.

But what The Kinsey Sicks lack in refinement, they make up with wit. They use their humor to make relevant social commentary. A spin-off of the Dixie Cups "Chapel of Love" is transformed into "Locked Out of the Chapel of Love," a crack at gay commitment ceremonies not formally recognized by the government. The Kinsey's sarcastic lyrics sum them up as, "emotionally compelling but legally meaningless ceremonies."

The Kinsey's also took time out to perform a more serious number. The song, written for a sick friend, was a chance to let the music stand alone. Their flawless voices easily hypnotized the crowd into an awed silence. It was a poignant moment in an otherwise upbeat show.

The Kinsey Sicks
Bowker Auditorium
Feb 9

Even though the energy level dropped a bit during the middle of the performance, The Kinsey's kept the audience alert by dragging some not so willing people on stage for a little crowd participation. The culmination involved putting someone in drag for the final number.

For those of you who don't know, the Kinsey Sicks just released their third CD "Sicks in the City." Like the others, it mixes immense vocal talent with their gift for comedy. The group will be touring to support the CD through the spring and make a return to the New England area in late March. So if you missed them this time, there's still one more chance to catch them before they, most likely, settle in for another summer in Provincetown.

Mayer's 'Any Given Thursday' addictive because it's so fun seriously played the song out.

He follows up with "Back to You" and "City Love" with minimal jamming or alterations from their original versions, but both are enjoyable nonetheless. After these songs, Mayer really starts to show the audience what he is made of. "Something's Missing" is the first of the three unreleased songs. It is a great song about feeling alone in light of all of the things one can appreciate in life. He follows this song up with the best song of the set. It starts out with an excellent cover of Stevie Ray Vaughn's "Lenny" and blends into the unbelievable, blues-tinged "Man on the Side." This is a flawless song about the underdog, pining for the girl that continuously overlooks how his affection for her has turned him into a lovesick fool. The best part about this song is that he performs it without the aid of the rest of the band. The result is an intimate, intense and emotional ballad that serves as a window into the soul of a scorned man.

Keeping with the feeling of "Man on the Side," Mayer is reunited with bassist and right hand man, David Labruyere, in a slowed down cover of The Police's "Message in a Bottle." Mayer is able to alter the song in his own way and still do justice to one of Sting's finest moments. He follows this up with a quick, feel-good rendition of "Love Song for No One" to end the first disc.

Disc two starts out strong with a funky jam intro to "Why Georgia," complete with new lyrics that stretch the song out to an excellent eight and one half minutes. After, he performs an excellent version of "Your Body is a Wonderland," in which he explains that it is "a song about girls' parts" and allows the audience to finish sing the chorus lines. He follows with an equally infectious rendition of "My Stupid Mouth." After vowing never to speak up again, he decides to add one more thing and describes his embarrassment further than he did on "Room for Squares" by saying, "Yes, my head is swirling/ welcome to my world/ its population: one/ and you can't come."

"Covered in Rain" is next and the last of the unreleased songs. It also serves as the best jam song on the album, lasting for almost 10 and one half minutes and worth every second. It is another bluesy and fairly slow song about being with someone simply for the sake of being with someone. After a guitar solo that seems more at home in 1973 than 2003, he describes the end of the affair vividly, "The day she left/ she mentioned something about it being for the best/ and I can't say that I disagree, it's killing me." He then proceeds into a cool version of "83" to finish the show that includes a medley of "Girls Just Wanna Have Fun" and "Let's Hear It for the Boy" at the end.

The encore consists of the lovely "Comfortable," complete with an extra final verse, and closes with a wild version of "Neon." "Neon" starts off with a jazzy intro and contains a jazz/funk/blues jam at the end that is enough to leave anyone stupefied. It also serves as a remarkable and fitting finish to a masterpiece of a live set.

"Any Given Thursday" is near flawless, and the set-list is somewhat similar to the one Mayer played at The Mullins Center last semester. It is the perfect outlet for the artist to display just how truly amazing he can be behind a guitar. One thing that separates this album from other live albums of today is how genuinely grateful Mayer seems to be for his fans and how far they have taken him. Mayer and his band have terrific chemistry; it is obvious they enjoy every microsecond of what they are doing, which puts this live album in a category alongside Dave Matthews Band's "Live at Red Rocks," when DMB were more about performing for their fans and not themselves, like they appear to do more often these days. "Any Given Thursday" is addictive, because everybody involved is having fun. It is definitely an excellent addition to any music enthusiast's CD collection.

Felt EP incomplete but still worth a listen

By Justin Chellman
Collegian Staff

First off, let it be known that "Felt" is an EP to an album that has no definite release date. And considering the songs on the EP have no real correlation and the sound is thrown together sloppily it's no big surprise. "Felt" is an underground supergroup collaboration, with Slug from Atmosphere and Murs from the Living Legends on vocals. The beats for the album are supplied from another living legend and accomplished lyricist, The Grouch (who doesn't rap on the whole album).

As supergroup projects go, it's usually a rule that if the album happens spur of the moment from inspiration, then it turns out to be phenomenal. But it seems as if this album was only done because these guys felt required to make some songs together to establish their crew status. The lyrics on this album are excellent at times but generally have no meaning, even though it is painfully obvious that Slug and Murs wanted to make the songs about real subjects. In the end, it all comes out disjointed and cocky. Also, not that it matters, but although the album is titled a tribute to Christina Ricci, she isn't mentioned once on any song on this album.

Murs & Slug
"FELT: A Tribute to Christina Ricci"
RSE/Access Hip Hop

The Grouch also failed to supply solid beats for this album, which follows the point that some beats are just not for certain emcees. The Grouch has always produced the majority of his beats on all his albums as well as the rhymes. Usually the Grouch sounds great on his albums over his beats but maybe only Grouch can rock his own beats, but whatever it was, the Grouch would have been better off just rapping on this album and to have left the production credits for someone else.

Both Slug and Murs respective last albums were dope ("Atmosphere/God Loves Ugly," and "MURS RULES THE WORLD") and miles better than this one. After listening to the two emcees prior work it is dumbfounding how this album fell so short of their previous albums. It is also funny because these two emcees are really hip-hop's odd couple, because Slug is a very emotional and abstract emcee and Murs is a charged flamboyant emcee. On this album they try and reverse those roles, especially with Slug whom raps really hard and uncharacteristically brags on this one.

When it is all said and done, there are three salvageable songs on this album, "Anneurysm," a song about anger management with a decent grouch beat, but annoying verse sung by Slug. "All I Can Do," and "Hot Bars," which has the album's best beats and just showcases the dope lyricism of both Murs and Slug. Hopefully these guys will attempt a different approach for the full-length album, if it ever materializes, because this EP is very unrepresentative of all of their true talent. Do not let this review deter anyone from buying any of these artists' previous or future works because they are truly three wonderful emcees. Murs drops another solo album later this year on EMI's new label, Definitive Jux, and promises to be a sick release because all that label has dropped has been incredible. Even talented artists don't always hit every time.

Talented duo of the arts offer words of wisdom proper education unless you read 'Souls of Black Folk,'" referring to the book by W.E.B. du Bois, which celebrates its centennial later this year.

Glover, a resident of San Francisco, spent a great deal of his formative years on his grandparents' farm in Georgia. He did not begin acting until he was in his early twenties, but was a quick study. While attending San Francisco State College and training at The American Conservatory Theatre's Black Actors' Workshop, he honed the skills that earned him widespread critical acclaim throughout his career in movies like "The Color Purple" and "Beloved." Glover also holds the title of Goodwill Ambassador for the United Nations, board chair of the TransAfrica Forum, and has received the Amnesty International USA Lifetime Achievement Award for his commitment to activism.

It is this commitment to proactive and constructive activities that connects these talented individuals. They spoke, not only of their own personal sense of responsibility as black artists, but also of the symbiotic relationship that exists between the artist and their supporters. Sanchez called the audience "to support the artists who love you." In her view, loving the artist enables them to create more, while increasing their profile within the artist's respective community. "I want to use my visibility as an artist to mobilize against injustice," stated Glover.

Another central theme of the discussion was humanity.

Both Glover and Sanchez acknowledged the historical tendency of society to keep the identity of African-Americans stifled. Popular culture sought to deny them the representation as whole persons, complete with a soul. The rationale for this, they discussed, had to do with the ability to maintain a status quo of oppression and destruction. "In order to destroy someone," Sanchez proclaimed, "you must keep them from becoming human."

According to both Sanchez and Glover, the responsibility of the black artist in the 21st Century is to preserve humanity and identity as something that is very precious, but yet cannot be acquired quickly. It is a proactive and committed endeavor, a point driven home by both speakers throughout their dialogue.

"It is not what we've accomplished here ... but what we do when we leave here," said Glover.

Rock journalist makes laughable assumptions

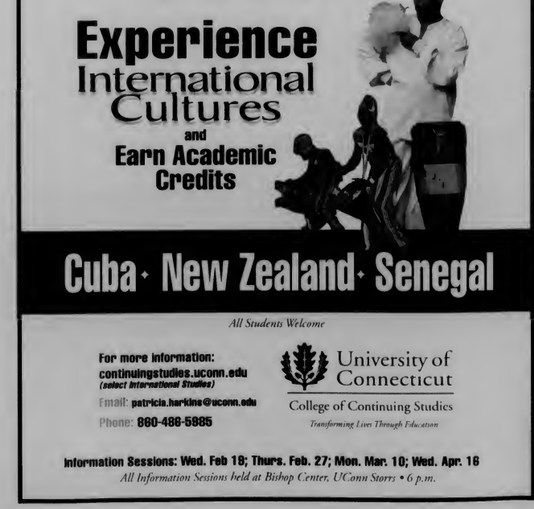
New York Village Voice, music journalist for the stupid.



I'm not saying that I'm anymore intelligent than Weisblatt, and to tell you the truth, I'm sure he's actually quite intellectual. He's a music columnist for such an amazing newspaper, so there has to be something right about him. I just think what I'm saying right now ... Maybe I don't know what I'm saying right now ...

But don't count on it.

you would know how much I raved about Audiovent and how talented they are, and it definitely has nothing to do with the fact that two of the band members are related to two of the members of Incubus.

So that's all, folks. And my point being? Just because it's in writing and just because it's in an amazing newspaper, it doesn't mean that the writer knows what he/she is saying.

Nicholson, Moore and Latifah score 75th annual Oscar nominations

[illegible] Kazan, Brando [illegible] Sidney, and Bogart [illegible] to the same [illegible] Adrien Brody as the [illegible] Szpilman in "The Pianist," Nicholson as [illegible] Melvin U. Frost in "About Schmidt," Michael Caine as a [illegible] Alfred in "The Quiet American," Daniel Day-Lewis as a [illegible] Bill the Butcher in "Gangs of New York" and Jack Nicholson as [illegible] Melvin U. Frost in "About Schmidt."

[illegible] won Oscars. Brody said it was tough to shake off the melancholy of shooting "The Pianist," based on a real Holocaust survivor's story.

"But I benefited so much from this experience," said Brody. "It puts so much in perspective. It taught me about life, human suffering and loss, and made me appreciate more the goodness in life."

The seven nominations for "The Pianist" also included one for director Roman Polanski, a fugitive from the United States for having had unlawful sex with a 13-year-old girl in 1977.

Scorsese has been nominated three times before but never won. He had been developing "Gangs of New York" since the early 1970s and had a highly publicized feud with Miramax chief Harvey Weinstein over the final cut.

"There's no doubt I get hotheaded," Scorsese said. "As personalities, we wound up learning to work together. That doesn't mean I didn't argue [illegible] If You Can."

Besides Marshall, Polanski and Scorsese, the best-director contenders were Pedro Almodovar, a surprise nominee for the Spanish-language film "Talk to Her," and Stephen Daldry for "The Hours."

Absent was Peter Jackson, director of "The Two Towers," who had earned a best-director nomination for the fantasy trilogy's first chapter, "The Fellowship of the Ring."

Scorsese has been nominated three times before but never won. He had been developing "Gangs of New York" since the early 1970s and had a highly publicized feud with Miramax chief Harvey Weinstein over the final cut.

"There's no doubt I get hotheaded," Scorsese said. "As personalities, we wound up learning to work together. That doesn't mean I didn't argue and scream and yell. He did too, which made me do it even more. But at the end, there was always reconciliation and humor that he could take what I could dish out."

Disney-owned Miramax will be competing with itself in many categories. Along with "Gangs," Miramax distributed "Chicago" and co-produced "The Hours" with Paramount. Weinstein and his brother, Bob, also have executive producer credits on "The Two Towers."

"Chicago" could emerge as the film to beat. It took the Golden Globe for best musical or comedy, and its actors have done well in other movie awards. The film did great business in fairly narrow release before expanding wider last weekend, and could finish as a $100 million hit.

ABC will broadcast the Oscar ceremony March 23 from Hollywood's Kodak Theatre.

Boston fans upset at Isiah somehow managed to keep his balance, spin around, and find teammate Dennis Johnson cutting down toward the basket. Bird flung the ball to a cutting Johnson who laid it in with one second remaining for the 108-107 victory.]

Just admit it, Isiah. You hate Boston.

["If Bird was black, he'd be just another good guy," said Thomas, after the Celtics' eventual series win.] When you see green, it feels like you've just downed a pint of vinegar. Accidentally put two tablespoons of salt in your coffee. Been left off the Dream Team, the greatest basketball team ever assembled. Ever.

I'm not saying you're bitter, or anything like that. Just that you hate us. It's been how many years now?

Coach Thomas, you've messed with the wrong city. And when you come back to Boston, Paul, Antoine and the rest of us leprechauns won't let your team forget it.

UMass set for one down

Dobbins are the Richmond's top three scorers.

None of the three are a true point guard, but Myers has taken on that role the most, averaging 4.5 assists per game. Dobbins, meanwhile, leads the team with 5.4 rebounds.

"They all do a little bit of everything," Lappas said. "They are very versatile."

With UMass' recent problems underneath, a matchup with a more perimeter-based squad could be exactly what the Minutemen need tonight.

"I think it's a team that we match up well against," Lappas said at practice yesterday.

Not that it seems to matter all that much. The Maroon and White have a habit of making half-decent – and sometimes worse – big men look like All-Americans.

"We've done a better job against some of the good guys we've played against," said Lappas, whose team has usually been successful at making teams' secondary options beat them.

Problem is, Richmond has a second option. And a third.

The Beanpot, a meaningless tourney

I'm told its good for college hockey. Not when deciding between a Beanpot title and a National Championship actually provokes thought in some fans.

Terrier coach Jack Parker got it right when he said he'd rather beat UMass in a conference game this past Saturday, than top the hated Eagles in the Beanpot final two nights ago.

So why can't Boston fans think the same way?

The Beanpot cheapens the growing landscape of college hockey. Beantown's Good 'Ol Boys Network no longer represents the epicenter of the college game. There was a time when the winner of the annual tournament was considered a favorite to reach the Frozen Four or even win the national title.

But the college hockey map now extends beyond Eastern Massachusetts. There are major locales in Orono, Maine and Durham, N.H. And a new power is burgeoning in the West.

Of course BC and BU still maintain their lofty status. But Harvard is annually overrated and the orchestra is tuning up for Northeastern's requiem as a tournament contender.

Some say it should be expanded to include the other four Division I programs in the Commonwealth. That's not the answer, nor is eliminating the event altogether.

But Boston is holding on to its illusions. Like Flutie Flakes and 1918, Beantown is too stubborn to live in the present.

Take away the grand stage of the Fleet and the most famous pot (not cup) in sports, and the Beanpot boils down to four out-of-conference games in mid-February.

At least some fans can understand that, including our friend in the cold outside Matthews Arena, who is still conjuring a response.

"The Beanpot? C'mon, this is hockey," he says. "I'll take all I can get."

Erickson hired by 49ers

By GREG BEACHAM
Associated Press

SANTA CLARA, Calif. (AP) – Dennis Erickson was hired Tuesday by the San Francisco 49ers to replace Steve Mariucci as coach in a surprising end to a search that stretched nearly four weeks.

Erickson will be introduced as the 49ers' 14th head coach at a news conference in San Francisco on Wednesday. The former Seattle Seahawks coach leaves Oregon State, where he went 31-17 over the last four seasons.

Mariucci, fired by owner John York on Jan. 15 despite leading San Francisco to four playoff berths in six seasons, signed a five-year contract with the Detroit Lions last week.

Erickson, who turns 56 next month, is an unexpected choice for San Francisco, which concentrated its search on NFL defensive coaches since York surprised his front office by firing Mariucci.

After wowing York and general manager Terry Donahue in a weekend interview, Erickson got a five-year contract worth $12.5 million – half of what Mariucci will make in Detroit.

Erickson is charged with continuing the winning tradition established by Bill Walsh, George Seifert and Mariucci.

"We have found what we were looking for in a new coach: a leader, a motivator, a teacher, an individual with exceptional skills in coaching," Donahue said. "Dennis Erickson has a long history of coaching winning teams, and I'm confident he'll succeed in San Francisco."

The search was praised by the candidates as deliberate and thorough, though Pro Bowl quarterback Jeff Garcia called it "embarrassing" for its apparent lack of direction. New York Jets defensive coordinator Ted Cottrell was the leading candidate until last weekend.

Donahue always said he planned to consider college head coaches. Earlier, several college coaches said they weren't interested, including Washington's Rick Neuheisel and Southern California's Pete Carroll.

Donahue and Erickson didn't immediately return cell phone calls Tuesday. Erickson was expected to address his players in Corvallis on Tuesday.

Erickson is just the 49ers' fourth coach since 1979, following Walsh and Seifert – who both won Super Bowls – and Mariucci. Erickson also is the first coach with prior NFL head coaching experience to take over the 49ers since Norman "Red" Strader in 1955.

Brett Hull scored his 700th goal in a 5-4 Detroit win against the San Jose. He beat the Sharks' Evgeni Nabokov with a wrist shot in the second period.

Hull joins 700-goal club

By LARRY LAGE
Associated Press

DETROIT (AP) – Brett Hull wanted to make history on the same night his team won. He got his wish.

Hull became the sixth NHL player to score 700 regular-season goals when he beat San Jose's Evgeni Nabokov with a wrist shot in the second period of a 5-4 victory Monday night.

Detroit's Patrick Boileau scored his second career goal with 2:37 remaining to win it.

"It's big that we won," Hull said. "The last thing I wanted was to get that goal when we were down 4-0 or something."

Hull was held without a goal in his previous seven games after scoring on Jan. 22 in Edmonton. Detroit snapped a six-game winless streak by beating the Sharks.

"I think it was a relief for everybody involved – the fans, players, Hully – we've all been feeling it lately," said Detroit's Brendan Shanahan, who also scored Monday night.

Only Wayne Gretzky scored 700 goals faster than Hull, who hit the mark in his 1,157th game. Gretzky, who finished with 894 goals, scored 700 in 886 games.

Gordie Howe (801), Marcel Dionne (731), Phil Esposito (717) and Mike Gartner (708) are the only other players to accomplish the feat.

"It's part of history and it was quite exciting to have been there," Detroit coach Dave Lewis said. "It was a special moment. I'm glad all the fans here in Detroit got to see that. It's like, you're not going to see a lot of that happen.

"It's a special, special moment in NHL history."

The milestone goal was a one-timer from the bottom of the left circle after a cross-ice pass from Pavel Datsyuk.

He was asked if it was "a vintage Brett Hull goal."

"I would think so," he said. "That's my spot, I guess."

In the only other NHL games, Minnesota edged Philadelphia 1-0, and Vancouver beat Chicago 2-1.

Hull's father, Hall of Famer Bobby Hull, scored 610 goals in 1,063 games over 16 NHL seasons. Brett Hull passed his father on the career list with his first goal of the 2000-01 season – his final year in Dallas. He said his father didn't attend Monday's game.

Hull began his career with Calgary and scored 26 goals with the Flames before being traded to St. Louis during the 1987-88 season.

It was with the Blues that Hull became "The Golden Brett," a takeoff of his father's nickname "The Golden Jet," stemming from their blond hair.

In 10-plus seasons in St. Louis, the 38-year-old Hull scored 527 goals, including 72 in 1989-90. He followed season – a record for a right wing – and 70 in the next. He surpassed the 50-goal mark in each of the next two seasons.

Following a 27-goal campaign in 1997-98, Hull signed as a free agent with Dallas. He scored 95 goals in three seasons with the Stars, including 32 in 1998-99. He added eight goals in the playoffs and scored the heavily disputed Stanley Cup-clinching goal in triple overtime in Game 6 of the finals in Buffalo.

Hull signed with the Red Wings before last season and scored 30 goals, helping Detroit to another Stanley Cup title. He has 21 goals this season, and has reached 20 in each of his 16 NHL seasons.

If he scores 14 more this season, an option in his contract will keep him in Detroit for another year. If Hull doesn't reach 35 goals, he will become an unrestricted free agent.

"I'm lucky, thankful and fortunate," Hull said.

"He's a great player ... it's a great goal for him," Nabokov said. "It's not a great goal for us."

Kris Draper and Henrik Zetterberg got the other Detroit goals. Mark Smith, Brad Stuart, Owen Nolan and Scott Thornton scored for San Jose.

Wild 1, Flyers 0

At Philadelphia, Manny Fernandez, in his first start since missing 13 games with an injured right knee, got his seventh career shutout. Fernandez turned away 30 shots.

In his first shutout of the season, Fernandez was rarely tested. A tenacious Minnesota defense helped send the Flyers to their eighth shutout loss of the season, the most since they were blanked eight times in 1969-70.

The Wild tied a franchise record with their 12th road victory in their 27th game away from home. Minnesota didn't win its 12th road game last year until its 68th game and 36th away from home.

Pascal Dupuis scored the only goal.

Canucks 2, Blackhawks 1

At Vancouver, British Columbia, Markus Naslund's NHL-leading 37th goal early in the third period lifted the Canucks.

Trent Klatt scored in the second period as Vancouver extended its unbeaten streak to seven games.

Mark Bell spoiled Cloutier's shutout bid with 42 seconds left, but the Blackhawks failed to catch Anaheim for eighth place in the Western Conference. Chicago finished a seven-game road trip with a 2-4-1 record, and has just two wins in its last 11 games.

Todd Bertuzzi assisted on Naslund's goal to extend his points streak to 11 games, the longest active streak in the league.

Hackett, Bruins continue to slide in loss to Canadiens

MONTREAL (AP) – Mike Ribeiro, Niklas Sundstrom and Jan Bulis scored and Mathieu Garon made 42 saves in his second straight start to lead the Montreal Canadiens to a 3-1 victory over the Boston Bruins on Tuesday night.

Ribeiro opened the scoring 6:27 into the second when he tipped a shot past goalie Jeff Hackett, who made his first appearance in Montreal since he was sent to Boston as part of a three-team deal that saw the Canadiens acquire Brian Savage from Nashville.

Sundstrom scored his fourth goal in seven games with Montreal at 18:19 of the second period as the Canadiens to their second straight win following a six-game winless streak.

Defenseman Dan Boyle scored his first goal of the season 2:25 into the third for the visiting Flames, who had won their previous two games.

Garon finished the scoring with 1:30 to go.

Hackett, who dressed but did not play, was pulled after he was recalled from Hamilton, the AHL affiliate where he had stopped all 25 shots he faced (2-0-0) in Washington on Boston lost its second straight and has just one win in five games (1-3-0-1). All-Star right wing Glen Murray had 10 of Boston's 43 shots, including four each in the first and third periods.

As the Canadiens were being outshot 11-5 in the first, Garon got a loud ovation from the sold-out crowd of 21,273 after he did the splits and stretched out his glove hand to stop Murray's backhand shot on a breakaway 13 minutes in.

Montreal opened the scoring 6:27 into the second when Ribeiro tipped defenseman Andrei Markov's point shot in mid-air and redirected it past Hackett.

Sundstrom, who had just two goals in 47 games with San Jose, got his sixth of the season when he backhanded a shot past Hackett with 1:41 left in the period.

Sweeney scored his first goal in 47 games this season to draw the Bruins to within one early in the third.

Later in the game, Garon stopped Murray's shot from the slot with just over two minutes left. Bulis put the game away with his 12th goal at 18:50.

Pat Riley fined $20,000 for criticizing officials on Tuesday

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) – Pat Riley, fined by the NBA for the second time this season, said he doesn't understand why his comments – which have taken a shot at the league's officiating – have led to another fine.

"Three fines, trips to Saks Fifth Avenue, enough's enough," Riley said. "I may have to bite my tongue."

The Miami Heat coach was fined $25,000 Tuesday for criticizing the officiating in a loss to Portland on Monday. He was fined with a $50,000 fine in December.

Riley insisted that his complaints weren't the equivalent of coaching a sport that's built on the Atlantic Ocean.

"I'm not complaining. I'm just fighting as much as I can to get what I can get."

In the wake of NBA commissioner David Stern's warning last week that he has had enough of gripes about referees, Riley said he wasn't surprised by the latest fine.

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) – Orlando Magic center Shawn Kemp was suspended without pay by the NBA on Tuesday, the third time he has violated the terms of the league's anti-drug policy.

Kemp's suspension began with Tuesday night's game against the New Jersey Nets, and will continue until he has resumed full compliance with his treatment program.

Orlando coach Doc Rivers received word of the suspension from general manager John Gabriel when he was getting into to his car to drive to the arena for the game.

"We don't know whether the program was violated or he just missed a test. You just hope things work out for him," Rivers said. "The basketball side of it with him I could honestly care less. He's not a bad guy at all."

Kemp practiced Monday and participated in the Magic's Tuesday morning shootaround at the TD Waterhouse Center. Gabriel spoke with him by telephone in the afternoon, but did not shed any light on why the 13th-year pro was suspended.

"I have no reaction because it's not clear what we would be reacting to," Gabriel said.

Asked how Kemp responded, Gabriel said: "He's just disappointed at the news. I can't elaborate."

A year ago, when he was with the Portland Trail Blazers, the 6-foot-10 Kemp was suspended for five games for violating the policy. He sat out from Feb. 22 through March 4 and lost $141,889 of his $12.77 million salary for each game he missed.

Baker returns to C's

By JIM COUR
Associated Press

SEATTLE (AP) – Boston Celtics forward Vin Baker, who missed last week's game against Seattle because of heart palpitations, rejoined the team Tuesday for a shootaround before their game against his former team, the SuperSonics.

Baker was cleared by doctors in Boston on Monday to fly to Seattle for Tuesday night's game.

"It was very scary for me," said Baker, who spent two nights at Boston's New England Baptist Hospital last week and was attached to a portable heart monitor until Saturday.

"Any time you're dealing with the heart and something you really don't have control over, it's scary," he said.

Sweating heavily after a 45-minute workout at the Key Arena, the 6-foot-11 Baker said he was happy to find out he was physically able to play again.

"My health is great," he said. "I feel great. I got a clean bill of health from the heart palpitations. It was the doctor's orders that kept me out of that game. I really wanted to play in the game."

Celtics coach Jim O'Brien said he planned to bring Baker off the bench in his return to Seattle.

"I would imagine he would play pretty much what he's been getting all year, 18 to 20 minutes," said O'Brien, who said Baker looked good at Tuesday's shootaround.

"He worked hard," he said. "You can tell from the amount of perspiration."

Baker, 31, is in his 10th NBA season. He spent five seasons with the Sonics, from 1997 until last July, when the Sonics traded him and the final four years of his $87 million contract to Boston along with Shammond Williams for Kenny Anderson, Vitaly Potapenko and Joseph Forte.

The four-time All-Star has career averages of 16.1 points and 7.9 rebounds, but he's gotten off to a poor start in Boston with career-lows of 5.2 points and 4.0 rebounds in an average of 18 1/2 minutes per game.

Before he took the court for the shootaround, Baker warmly greeted some of his former Sonics teammates, who were leaving after Seattle's shooting session. He hugged Sonics forward Rashard Lewis.

"I've been looking forward to coming back to Seattle," he said. "I had some great times here and I've been looking forward to coming back and seeing some good friends."

Baker said he hopes to play better and make a bigger contribution to the Celtics in the second half of the season.

"I haven't gotten off to the start I wanted to, but we've got the whole second half of the season," he said. "Now that I've got a clean bill of health from the doctors, I'm not going to worry about anything."

Patriots release preseason slate; Giants up first

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) – The New England Patriots on Tuesday announced their four 2003 preseason opponents, including the NFC East champion Philadelphia Eagles, who will face the Patriots in the inaugural game at Philadelphia's Lincoln Financial Field.

The game at the $512 million stadium will be the Patriots third of the preseason.

The exact date of each of the four games hasn't been determined, though the team announced the week of each game.

The Patriots open the preseason against the New York Giants at home between Aug. 7-11, then travel to play the Washington Redskins between Aug. 14-18 and Philadelphia between Aug. 21-25. They close the preseason at home against the Chicago Bears between Aug. 28-31.

New England's regular season schedule isn't set, but the Patriots' opponents have been announced.

The Patriots will play the Bills, Dolphins, Jets, Browns, Cowboys, Jaguars, Giants and Titans at home. The team will be on the road to face the Bills, Dolphins, Jets, Broncos, Texans, Colts, Eagles and Redskins.

By JEFF LINKOUS
Associated Press

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) – The postgame encounter was brief, just long enough for LeBron James to put his arm around a referee, lean in and smile for the camera.

Now, however, that seemingly innocent moment could hurt referee Tony Celantano, who faces possible sanctions for his actions following James' impressive comeback game on Saturday night.

The president of the central New Jersey chapter of the International Association of Approved Basketball Officials said the group is investigating whether Celantano broke any rules by posing with the 18-year-old high school basketball star.

"We're just trying to sort out all the facts," the association's president, Fred Dumont, said Tuesday.

Celantano posed with James after the senior scored a career-high 52 points to lead top-ranked St. Vincent-St. Mary's of Akron, Ohio, to a 78-52 victory over Westchester of Los Angeles at the Prime Time Shootout in Trenton.

It was James' first game since a judge in Ohio restored his eligibility on Feb. 5, allowing him to resume playing. James, expected to be the No. 1 pick in the next NBA draft, was ruled ineligible for the rest of the season by the Ohio High School Athletic Association on Jan. 31 after he accepted two retro sports jerseys valued at $845 from a Cleveland clothing store. But the judge reduced James' punishment to two games; he's already missed one and will sit out the other later this month.

After Saturday night's game, James posed with his right arm around Celantano. James is grinning slightly.

While posing for pictures with a player doesn't violate any specific rules for referees, Dumont said Celantano spoke to him and conceded he used bad judgment.

Dumont added, however, that he was confident the game was called impartially.

"I was at the game. I don't have a problem with how the game was officiated," Dumont said.

Dumont declined to specify what sanctions that Celantano might face, but he said he expected his association to make a determination within a week. The organization that oversees scholastic sports in New Jersey will review the findings.

Celantano, a 27-year veteran, remains eligible to officiate, Dumont said.

"He's still free to be a referee and happens to be an outstanding referee," Dumont said. "He's a very professional person; he's an experienced official."

Celantano told The Times of Trenton that the photo was taken by a relative and was not for personal use. After officiating another high school game Sunday, Celantano told the newspaper he sought an autograph from James for a friend's child.

Celantano did not return several telephone messages left at his Hamilton home Tuesday by The Associated Press.

Jim Loper, associate director of the New Jersey State Interscholastic Athletic Association, saw the pose during television coverage of Saturday's Prime Time Shootout.

"I thought, 'Holy cow.' As officials, you want to stay in the middle," he said.

OHSAA director Bob Goldring said that if the same thing happened in Ohio, "we would deem it unethical, and we would have the authority to fine or suspend an official in that case."

Minutewomen swing away

Beat No. 13 ASU

By JEFF BOYD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The UMass softball team, led by senior Jamie Cahalan, went 2-3 in the Sun Devil classic in Arizona this weekend. The Minutewomen took wins from No. 13 Arizona State and the Big 12's Texas Tech.

The Massachusetts Softball Team opened the 2003 season this weekend in Phoenix, Ariz. by participating in the annual Fiesta Bowl Tournament. The Minutewomen, who went into the tournament ranked No. 25 in the nation, dropped their first three contests, but rebounded to win their last two.

While most people would look at their 2-3 mark as a disappointment, the coaches and team members are pleased with their performance and consider this weekend to have been a step in the right direction.

"You know what, we could have won those games," coach Elaine Sortino said. "We didn't lose those games. I don't think that we could have asked our kids to do any better."

In the first day of competition, UMass was faced with the daunting task of playing both No. 14 Stanford and No. 10 Cal State Fullerton.

Against Stanford, the Minutewomen found themselves in a defensive struggle which they ultimately lost 2-1. Ace Kaitlin Holtz did her part for UMass by allowing only two runs on eight hits with two strikeouts.

Trailing Stanford 2-0 in the sixth, UMass came up short on a last ditch effort to tie the game as Emily Robustelli scored the only run for the Minutewomen, with the RBI going to Hilary Puglia.

While wins against UMass when Holtz is on the mound are rare, Sortino knew that participating in this tournament would test both her pitching staff and her defense.

"Nobody has any idea of the enormity of these teams and their offensive power," Sortino said. "We feel that we have some of the best pitching in the country, and I felt that we handled our at-bats as well as a coach could ask their team this early in the year."

Robustelli and Puglia teamed up again for the Minutewomen by knocking in the team's only run in the day's second game against Cal State Fullerton. Pitcher Kelli Arnold allowed only three runs on eight hits for UMass, but needed more run support as the Minutewomen fell 3-1.

Although Sortino was hoping to post some wins on opening day, she had nothing but praise for her squad, particularly for Puglia.

"When speaking of young people that really show themselves up, you have to start with Hilary," Sortino said. "She was outstanding. She's a player. There's nothing greater a coach can say about their kids than to say that she's a player."

Day two of the Fiesta Bowl Tournament provided no rest for the Minutewomen as they faced off against a Nebraska team that was ranked No. 4 in the nation, and Big 12 powerhouse Texas Tech.

Nebraska got out to a quick 2-0 lead after three innings until UMass came back to tie the game in the fifth on a home run by Brandi Cross. The game remained tied through seven innings until Nebraska put it away with two runs in the eighth.

"Our team understands what they did, and they understand what they didn't do. They understand what they do well and they understand what they need to do better," Sortino said.

At this point, it would have been easy for the Minutewomen to pack it in and give up on what was turning out to be a disastrous road trip. However, the team did not even have time to assess the loss because they were scheduled to take on Texas Tech only five minutes after the Nebraska game.

Frustrated with their last defeat, UMass opened up the game against Tech with a two run first inning that was powered by a second Cross homerun. The Minutewomen then added runs in the second, third, and fifth innings. Arnold made her second appearance of the season against Texas Tech, and limited their offense to two runs on six hits, leading the Minutewomen to a 3-2 victory, their first of the season.

"We couldn't do anything about what just happened [against Nebraska] and I think what it showed was the maturity of our team," Sortino said. "We had no time to lick our wounds, or validate, or debrief after the Nebraska game."

On the final day of competition, the Minutewomen found themselves in a must-win game against host school Arizona State.

The No. 13 Sun Devils, who were looking to close out the tournament with a victory at home, took UMass into extra-innings but were unable to keep pace with Sortino's rejuvenated squad.

Robustelli continued to provide the Minutewomen with some much needed offense as she drove in what turned out to be the game-winning run in the top of the eighth inning.

UMass first got on the board in the third inning when Puglia once again drove in Robustelli from second base on an RBI single. The Minutewomen added to their lead in the fourth when Holtz provided run support for herself by driving the ball out of the park for a solo-homerun that put UMass up 2-0.

Arizona State answered in the bottom of the inning with their first run of the game, and later evened the score at 2-2 on a seventh inning solo home run. However, the deadlock lasted only a few minutes until the Minutewomen broke it wide open with three runs in the eighth. The win improved UMass's record to 2-3.

"Starting there at their home site with one of the most formidable opponents in the PAC-10 was a great win for the University of Massachusetts," Sortino said. "We are inspired to go forward. This is very motivating to us."

The Minutewomen are not slated to take to the field again until Feb. 21, when they travel to Columbus, Ga. to participate in the MCA Lead-Off Classic. The team will use this time to fix-up any loose ends in their game in preparation for the rest of the season. Sortino remains confident that her team can maintain its focus over the following weeks and months.

"If there's one thing about this team that impresses me, it's their mentality," Sortino said. "This team has a mentality unlike any team that I've coached before."

Note to Isiah: It's my column

Eric Soderstrom

Don't bother trying to get those trusty $10 upper balcony seats for the Celtics-Pacers game, Feb. 26 at the FleetCenter. The zippy, Causeway Street scalpers have already got to them. If you want to see Paul Pierce and Antoine Walker punish Indiana coach Isiah Thomas for his blatant disrespect of them in last weekend's All-Star game, it's going to run you at least eight hours of minimum wage.

But it'll be worth it, even if you have to grow a muffet, stop showering, and sit outside South Station shaking a Dunkin Donuts cup at passers-by. Going by the grousing second-half looks of Paul and Antoine as they sat on the East bench Sunday in Atlanta, powerless under charge of the old, lordly Piston, avengement is definitely in order.

[Note: Remember the 1987 Eastern Conference Finals, when the defending champion Boston Celtics were losing to the gritty Detroit Pistons and in jeopardy of dropping Game 5, which would have put the Pistons in good position to clinch the series at Detroit in Game 6? With the Celtics down one point, only a few seconds remaining and the Pistons in possession of the basketball, the Luck O' Boston struck once again. ..]

The Green's All-Star duo played a combined total of 27 minutes last weekend, 18 for Pierce and nine for Walker. All of those minutes would have been first half ones had Michael Jordan not conceded after the first overtime. That's the only reason Pierce got an extra five. He wasn't supposed to play anymore.

Toward the end of the fourth quarter, Craig Sager, court reporter for TNT, asked the two Celtics why they hadn't found time in the second half. "Ask the coach," they responded. Thomas' answer? "It's my team."

[...As Detroit's Isiah Thomas set to inbound the ball from the sideline, Boston's Larry Bird kept an eye on him and saw Thomas glance toward Pistons center Bill Laimbeer, situated in the low post. Bird then, making one of the greatest plays in NBA history, cut into the passing lane and stole the ball. ..]

Sorry, Zeke. Try again. Your team is Indiana. Not the Eastern Conference All-Stars. No one's going to fire you for losing an All-Star game. No one actually cares if you lose an All-Star game. No one even cares if you win.

Just play everyone so that Little Timmy in Southie has an excuse to stay up past his bedtime. It doesn't matter that Toine's shooting percentage was as inadequate as Mariah Carey's half-time performance. Or that The Truth missed all of his 3-point heaves in the first half. Nothing like that matters in an All-Star game.

If victory meant homecourt advantage in the NBA Finals for the winning conference, then fine. Do what you have to do. Play the guys who are hot. But when victory only means an extra $10,000 (into the pockets of multi-millionaires), what does it matter? This game is about as worthless as a Yen in Turkey.

I'm glad Thomas forgot about his aging, boring clash with MJ, let His Airness play 36 minutes and gave him the opportunity to drill the should-have-been game-winner in his final All-Star appearance (or so it seems). He deserved it more than anyone ever will.

But there's no way Thomas can admirably back his decision to snub the Boston boys. Yesterday on ESPN's "Pardon The Interruption", Michael Wilbon said the verdict was based on the fact Pierce and Walker were acting like children, chanting incessantly at their teammates to pass to Jordan each trip down the court. But that's equally as wrong as stealing sugar packets from McDonald's.

Everyone wanted MJ to do well, especially those who've idolized him, Pierce and Walker included. It's no reason not to play them, especially in a game created entirely for the fans. Fans that like rim-rocking jams, 40-foot bombs, and slinky-like passes. Not cocky, hotshot coaches. How many times Sunday did Zeke compliments come pouring from the Atlanta crowd? "Wow, nice coaching move, Isiah." "Way to make the right decisions."

[...Bird nearly fell victim to the baseline, but the Legend

Boston's Beanpot a meaningless tourney

Matthew F. Sacco

It is the huh of a New England winter, but that doesn't deter these fellas. They're standing outside 88-year-old Matthews Arena, on the corner of St. Botolph and Gainsborough in Boston.

Two die-hards, black-clad and faces coated with the shades of their team. Their pipe cleaner frames offer little respite from the wind gusts that locomotive down Beantown's narrow back streets.

The winter hats pulled down to just below their eyebrows and the collars of their sweat-shirts hanging on their clefts leave just enough room for a plea.

"Go Huskies!" roars past their lips as they vend shirts that read "BC Sucks." Every three or four yells they pause to blow chilled breath into their gloves.

They pace around a sandwich board like they've been standing there for hours. The board reads: "10 bucks for a shirt and a BU sucks bumper sticker."

These guys take their college hockey seriously. Why else would they face-off with a minus-13 degree wind chill to barter with cash-strapped students.

It's five minutes before the puck drops, and still no takers.

Finally an intrigued fan seeks out an audience with the pair. With their spirits ignited by the cash-bearing single, the group waves on about Northeastern squads of past and present.

Soon they part and with t-shirt and bumper sticker in hand, the fan turns and waves.

"See you at the Beanpot," one of the vendors yells back.

The fan is halted. "What, aren't you going inside...for the game?" he retorts.

"Nah. We can't watch this team, they're so bad. We only go to the Beanpot."

It's that attitude that leaves Matthews Arena half-empty for regular season contests, while the 19,600-seat Fleet Center sells out for a consolation game between Northeastern and Harvard.

Leave it to Boston.

From the people that brought you the "Yankees Suck" chant and the train station that was Boston Garden, we get a four-game hockey tournament played for a 31-year-old piece of kitchenware.

And people in the area hype it like they've got a personal invite to the Vatican.

I'm told it's important because it's for local bragging rights.

Well Boston's two best college teams – the Terriers and Eagles – play three times a year in conference game that actually mean something.

So what need is there for a whole tournament to decide. Especially when lately, the outcome has been about as hard to predict as Alf-Liston II.

BC has been so dominant – winning eight of the last nine including a 3-2 win over BC Monday night – that many have taken to calling it the Terrier Invitational.

Still, over 17,000 people filled the Fleet on Monday to watch two games that mean but two things right now: Jack and squat.

Injury adds to UMass' woes

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Monday night, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas was thinking of giving freshman center Alassane Kouyate more playing time.

Hustling back and forth from the interview table with radio host Bob Behler to a table of reporters during the commercial breaks of The Steve Lappas Show at the Hangar, the second-year coach said that he was considering taking a stronger look at No. 21.

"He's the only freshman who hasn't gotten a chance," said Lappas, who has currently has three rookies in the starting lineup.

The Minutemen were just two days removed from a 61-50 loss to Temple, a defeat that out rebounded UMass (8-14, 2-7 Atlantic 10) 44-26. The Owls (7-12, 3-4 A-10) scored 24 second-chance points in the contest compared to just two for the Minutemen.

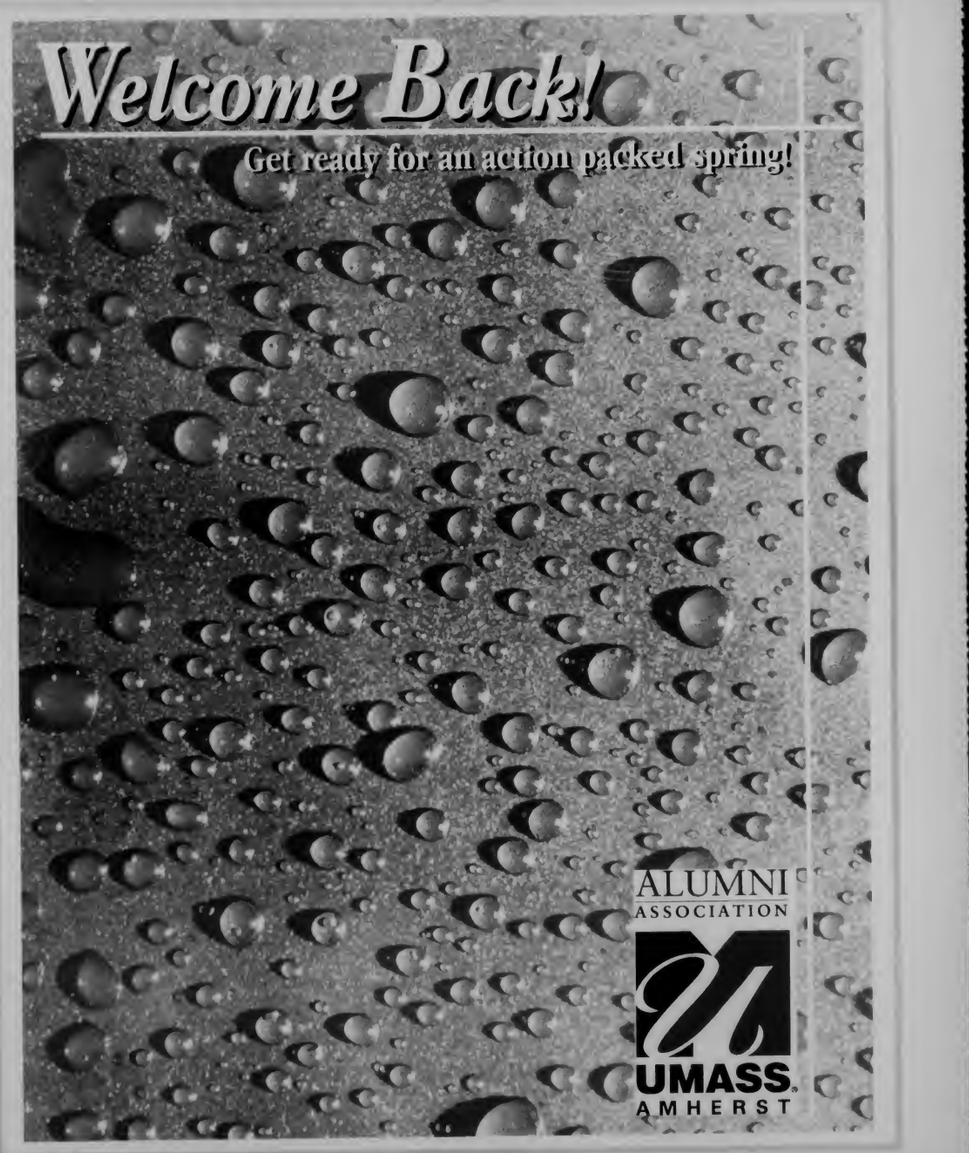
Lappas figured that if his big guys were going to have that much trouble inside, Kouyate "couldn't be any worse."

But it was revealed yesterday at practice that Kouyate had been admitted to the hospital Monday night. Lappas told reporters that Kouyate had taken a ball to his side at the beginning of practice.

Kouyate was fine through practice, Lappas said, but began to feel pain later in the evening while in his dorm room. He was taken to University Health Services after placing a call to assistant coach Andrew Theokas before being taken to Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, where he stayed the night.

According to Lappas, the hospital believes that Kouyate may have done something to his pancreas, but is expected to make a full recovery.

Kouyate had not been released as of press time yesterday, and will not be playing in tonight's game against Richmond (12-8, 6-3 A-10).



The Spiders, who are third in the A-10 West, rely heavily on their perimeter. Small forward Mike Skrocki and guards Jeff Myers and Tony

*Also coming this semester...the first Etiquette Dinner! Learn how to use all the extra silverware and which glass is yours at a dinner. Keep your eyes open for the upcoming date and time.

Bet you are wondering "What is STARS?"

STARS is the STudent Alumni Relations Society. It is a student group that works very closely with your UMass Amherst Alumni Association and the Alumni Relations Office. STARS was formed to bridge the gap between present UMass Amherst students and alumni. STARS members plan and attend many events including Welcome Bundles for new students, Oozefest, Commencement Ball and help with Homecoming, Family Day and Alumni Weekend. These events bring STARS members together with alumni and other students throughout the year.

Not only do STARS members do things for the UMass Amherst community but they also...

- are eligible for scholarships
- have a chance to meet many outstanding alumni
- have a chance to take on a leadership role in an organization
- attend national and regional conferences
- and represent you on the UMass Amherst Alumni Association Board of Directors.

This year STARS has been asked by Chancellor Lombardi to perform a new role as student representatives at events hosted by him and/or Mrs. Lombardi. This group has been named the Chancellor's Personal Hosts. STARS is very excited about this program. In order for you to be considered to be a Chancellor's Personal Host, you must be a member of STARS for at least one semester, so join STARS now and you can be hosting events next fall! It's a great opportunity to meet alumni, various university dignitaries, and special guests.

STARS is open to any UMass Amherst student who is interested in making a difference at the University. General meetings are held every other Wednesday evening in Memorial Hall at 5:30 p.m. Our next meeting is February 19th. Give us a call at 577-1390 for more information.

Join us in helping to make the student experience at UMass Amherst the best it can be.

Alumni Association Grants Program

Your Alumni Association is dedicated to improving and enhancing student life and the image of the University. The UMass Amherst Alumni Association offers grants of up to $2,000 to campus groups or alumni based organizations.

The UMass Amherst Alumni Association provides services and programs that enlighten, strengthen and develop students, faculty, staff, Association members and alumni bodies at UMass Amherst.

The deadlines for applications for this academic calendar year are as follows:

	Date Due:	For Events after:
Funding Cycle 3:	February 24, 2003	March 14, 2003-May 8, 2003
Funding Cycle 4:	April 21, 2003	May 9, 2003 and after

Guidelines and application forms are available on the UMass Amherst Alumni Association website at www.UMassAlumni.com. Copies of these forms can also be obtained by calling the UMass Amherst Alumni Association at 545-2317 or stopping by the main office in Memorial Hall.

SGA senators duke it out over vacant position

By KRISTIN SHREWSBURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Emotions ran high last night as a motion was called to the Student Government Association (SGA) Senate floor and members debated over two candidates vying for a tiebreak for the Southwest at-large Senate seat.

Members debated for both Southwest candidates, Christopher Carlozzi and Rukia Dahiras. Members of the Senate were split as issues arose between members of the Asian, Latino, African and Native American (ALANA) caucus and members of the Senate body.

Senators questioned Carlozzi, the current President of the Republican Club and editor-in-chief of the Minuteman newspaper, and his accountability to the Senate.

Dahiras was also questioned in regards to her accountability to the Senate and for why she was not running as a member of the ALANA caucus. The question sparked tension revolving around racial issues.

"Just for clarification, anyone of any race can inquire to run as a member of the ALANA caucus," Speaker Dan Saunders said.

The motion was put forth to a roll call vote, with Carlozzi receiving 24 votes and Dahiras 21. The motion was then called for reconsideration by the Senate and debated. Student Trustee Bill Powers said that within SGA bylines, a two-thirds majority must be reached.

The motion to reconsider both candidates was then voted on and passed by the Senate. It was tabled back to the Administrative Affairs committee, where it will be reconsidered for next week's agenda.

"Everything is positive about it, and I'm still going to work hard for the position," Dahiras said.

Carlozzi expressed similar feelings, saying that aside from issues raised by the Senate, it showed areas that may need to be fixed.

"I tried my hardest to be upfront, and other people had their own agendas," Carlozzi said. "Some important things showed up tonight as a result. Hopefully the Senate will be able to get some of these loop holes fixed up."

Aside from Senate seat appointments, the Senate allocated $2,955 to the Haitian American Student Organization (HASA). The money will be used to help put on a three-day conference at the University of Massachusetts supporting Haitian issues and promoting diversity on campus.

This is the first conference to be held at a public university, and it will feature guest panelist singer and songwriter Wyclef Jean.

Our goal is to raise awareness, educate and address issues surrounding culture and to get people involved," HASA President Frantzlyne Monestime said.

The event will take place Feb. 21 through Feb. 23 in the Campus Center.

The SGA also granted the UMass crew club a $17,000 loan out of a finance reserves fund to purchase a new racing boat.

"Aside from everything it was one of the best meetings we've had all year," Saunders said. "We have great people who can represent students and who are here doing it. Like so many places on campus, we have great people. We just need to get the student structure together to support these people."

Career fair offers opportunity

Students meet with 73 booths of employers

Students meet with representatives from various companies at the Campus-Wide Career Fair in the Campus Center Auditorium yesterday. Companies including Toys R' Us, Abercrombie and Fitch and Texas Instruments attended the fair.

COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Career Services hosted its annual Campus-Wide Career Fair yesterday, with the booths of 73 employers lined up in the Campus Center auditorium, helping to make it Career Service's biggest event of the year.

The booths overflowed into the lobby at the base of the escalators. Students were welcomed with green pamphlets providing an index of what employers were in attendance and a short introduction to the company. Employers offered various booklets, flyers and pamphlets containing a wealth of information previewing the company, its hiring policy and opportunities one could find to expand their career within the company.

Along with these packets of information, students had the opportunity to personally chat with representatives from the company to ask specific questions. If further interested, many employers had contact lists and were willing to sign qualified students up for job interviews.

The majority of students who attended the annual Campus-Wide Career Fair were either graduating seniors looking for a job or juniors who were beginning to comb over the market in search of what possibilities are there for the future. They came prepared, with many dressed to impress and carrying several copies of their resumes.

Employers came to the fair for various reasons, including trying to fill job positions in local companies and finding the labor forced needed to help them expand into the Massachusetts area. They ranged from the United States Department of Agriculture Farm Service Agency to English First and the Raytheon Company.

Students majoring in English, business and marketing generally seemed to leave the Career Fair having felt they accomplished their purpose in coming to the fair.

"I like it, overall," senior Josh Kantor said.

Kantor said he liked that he found multiple employers of interest along with possible interviews and companies to follow up contact with.

Other students didn't necessarily find the start to their career path at the fair, yet they appreciated the wealth of opportunities.

"I'm glad they had institutes down here," senior Erin McCarthy, a psychology major, said. "They're hard to find."

However, for nearly every person who appreciated the opportunities and findings at the Campus-Wide Career Fair, there was another who left feeling disappointed.

"I'm an accounting major and there's more marketing and sales," senior Mao-Ying Tien said.

Engineering majors also complained about the lack of diversity in majors at the fair.

"There's not enough for computer engineering," senior Michael Marrama said.

The fair did include companies such as GCC printers, United Technologies Corporation and Amgen Inc., but the number of employers seeking engineering majors was far fewer then the students expected.

Communications major Fernando Golfe also had complaints.

"Communications majors is the biggest on campus. This is a job fair. We (seniors) graduate in May," he said. "What are we supposed to do?"

Students whom failed to find interests among the fair are encouraged to contact the Career Services.

License plate in the works

Money earned to go towards scholarships

By DAVID GRANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Raising money for scholarships and boosting school spirit are the driving factors behind a new UMass license plate program soon to be introduced by the University of Massachusetts Alumni Association.

"This will be a litmus test for school spirit," said Susan G. Mattei, executive director of the Alumni Association.

Mattei said there are close to 85,000 UMass-Amherst alumni who reside in Massachusetts, and added that the program is limited to and aimed at the Amherst campus.

However, the plates are not limited to alumni.

"Alumni and friends, current students, faculty and staff often like to buy the plates when they know that the revenue provides an enhancement to students in some form," Chancellor John V. Lombardi said.

Lombardi said the value of the program is obvious in that it creates both a means for displaying school pride and a source of revenue for scholarship programs.

The program comes after legislators enacted a bill last fall giving non-profit organizations such as UMass an opportunity to create specialty license plates. The Department of Registry said the demand has been high for specialty plates.

The Registry requires the association pay a $100,000 bond to get the program moving. An initial commitment of 1,500 plate orders is then needed for the plates to be made and offered. A total of 3,000 plates need to be sold in the first two years to ensure the program moves forward.

The plates will be sold for $40, with $12 going to RMV and the remaining $28 retained by the Alumni Association. Each time the plate is renewed thereafter the entire $40 goes toward the scholarship fund. Mattei said the plates will be available for purchase directly through the alumni association.

Mattei said there has been considerable interest so far, but no numbers were available to report. She said the Alumni Association will use its resources, including email and a newsletter that goes out to 33,000 alumni, to market the program.

"Alumni who work at car dealers and insurance agencies will hopefully have the UMass plate on their desk," Mattei said, referring to other ways to market the plate.

A SUCCESS IN THE PAST

Similar programs at Indiana and Florida, two schools Lombardi has also served at, have been highly successful in both raising school awareness and funding scholarships.

"In ten years we have brought in close to $5 million for scholarships," said Dottie Warmbier, program director at Indiana University.

Indiana uses the catchy phrase "Ride with Pride" as a marketing tag line to sell the plates to about 160,000 alumni households in the state.

Warmbier said in the first three years of the program, the alumni association at Indiana sold 5,700, 12,000 and 21,000 plates respectively, an increase of 110 percent in year two and 75 percent in year three.

Support for the program at the University of Florida has also been strong. As one of the pioneers in the license plate program, Florida has raised $21.3 million since its inception in 1987. Its web site states that 251,286 plates have been sold. The logo was redesigned in 1997.

According to a report in the Union-News, the popular "whale plate" in Massachusetts has been issued to 52,000 cars, raising $10.4 million, while the "Cape Cod light-

Student to serve six months after protest

By JAMIE LOO AND JULIE GLOBUS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts student Jason Lydon was one of two protesters sentenced in Georgia Tuesday in connection with a November protest. The judge handed down the harshest penalty possible - Lydon will go to jail for six months and pay a fine of $500.

Lydon was one of 86 people arrested in November at a protest in Columbus, Ga. at the School of Americas. He was sentenced today after being arrested in November for trespassing on the site of the school at Fort Benning. Lydon was one of 35 defendants on trial for civil disobedience at the school, which has since been renamed the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation. He was one of 10,000 protestors calling for the closure of the combat training school for Latin American soldiers.

Opponents of the school say graduates of the school are constantly involved in human rights abuses. In 1996 the Pentagon was forced to disclose training manuals from the school that included the use of torture, extortion and execution among other practices. The trial, which began on Tuesday, ended today with a sentence of six months in prison and a $500 fine. Six months is the maximum sentence given for a misdemeanor trespassing charge.

Thirty-one defendants pleaded guilty or entered not guilty pleas but signed stipulations admitting that they trespassed onto the military base during the protest. Five protestors received 90-day prison sentences and $1,000 fines. Another two were sentenced to probation, with 250 hours of community service and $1,000 in fines. Forty-two other defendants were tried and convicted in January on the same charges.

Lydon, who has been protesting for the past six years, pleaded not guilty. Though his attorney, Ed Osowski put forth a presentation filled with many arguments, Lydon was still found guilty by U.S. Magistrate G. Mallon Faircloth.

Although Lydon chose not to testify during the trial, he did speak before the sentencing. He still supports his actions, as he did right after his arrest. He believed that he was obligated to protest the injustice of the School of the Americas.

"We're training terrorists right here in our land to go murder hundreds of thousands of people," Lydon said, according to the Atlanta Journal-Enquirer.

In a country that claims to stand for freedom and justice, a school such as the School of the Americas cannot exist, he added.

Lydon seemed willing to accept his punishment as long as his message was heard.

"I believe that because I am able to make a greater statement, I must do that," Lydon said, the Journal-Enquirer reported.

Lydon was heavily involved in activism on campus and in the Five College community. A devoted member of the Unitarian Universalist Association, he had also been actively speaking out against the war. He has also been a youth counselor and worked on lesbian, bisexual and transgender issues. Lydon has arranged for independent studies so that he can continue school while in prison. He believes that his sentence is an opportunity to learn more about political issues, so that he can work more for social justice when he is released.

India program to meet tonight

By Leah Vitale
Collegian Correspondent

Vaakar The Arts in India Study Program will host an informational meeting today from 4 to 6 p.m. in Memorial Hall for students interested in attending the program next year.

Vaakar, which means "motif" in Hindu, offers students a chance to experience the culture and country of India during winter break while earning college credit for their trip.

"It's only in the context of a study program as well organized and planned as this that one can begin to understand the richness of the arts in India," said Mary Purcell, a UMass student and program veteran.

Participants in the program range from Greenfield Community to Amherst College and vary in study from anthropology to theatre. Ages of participants have ranged from college freshman to a 73-year old retired professor.

According to UMass student Marlena Zahm, the program provides students from all different backgrounds with the chance of a lifetime to study Indian art through music, dance and architecture.

Zahm said that her group traveled all along the Western Coast of India, beginning in Mumbai and Aurangabad, where they observed cave paintings from the Indian Middle Ages. They also went to New Dehli, where they talked to the Prime Minister and heard his hopes for the country.

She said that students of the month-long program gained both a better understanding of and appreciation for Indian culture.

Zahm taught a group of 20 boys how to tap dance while in India, who ranged in age from 10 to 18.

"They felt a desire to learn something different without imposing a judgment on it," she said.

Zahm said that the trip was an experience in which she gained "spiritual enlightenment." She recommends the program to anyone and everyone with an open mind, particularly those interested in the arts. Upon completion of the trip, students receive three credits and a new appreciation for India and its arts.

Columbia investigation to begin

By Mike Schneider
Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) – Thousands of pieces from the space shuttle Columbia began arriving Wednesday at the Kennedy Space Center, where they will be spread out in a huge hangar and at least partially reconstructed by investigators trying to determine what went wrong.

The investigative board that will lead that investigation, headed by retired Navy Adm. Harold Gehman Jr., also arrived at the space center. Its members wanted to see the hangar, he said, as well as where shuttles are prepared for flight, launched and refurbished.

"A lot of people at NASA are telling us a lot of things; we need to see the things they're talking about," Gehman said. "This is an orientation visit."

The first shipment of debris, found scattered across Texas and Louisiana, arrived in two tractor-trailers shortly after 9 a.m.

The scope of the task was made clear by Navy Rear Adm. Stephen Turcotte, a member of the investigative panel.

"Looking at the complexity of this, it is huge," Turcotte said Tuesday. "It is one of the biggest debris fields that I think any of us have ever seen."

As commander of the Naval Safety Center, Turcotte is responsible for probing every aviation mishap in the Navy and Marine Corps.

The initial loads of debris left Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana on Tuesday. The debris will be laid out in a 50,000-square-foot hangar on a grid marked by yellow and blue tape. The nine-member inquiry board will have offices in the same hangar, although the board is based in Houston.

Gehman said Tuesday at Johnson Space Center in Houston that no debris has been recovered west of Fort Worth, Texas. But he added: "We have reason to believe that we should keep looking west of Fort Worth."

Debris in west Texas could be especially significant because it could help explain how and when Columbia started breaking apart as it aimed for a Florida touchdown. All seven astronauts aboard were killed.

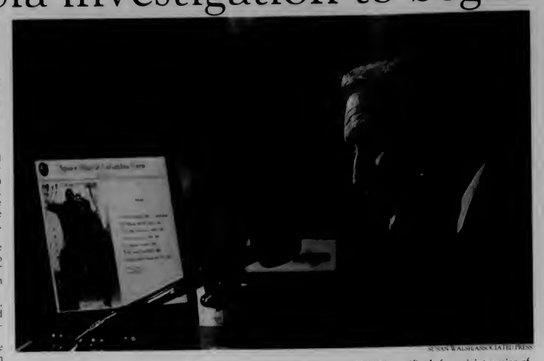
Separately, NASA also said officials from Johnson Space Center had called experts at its Langley research facility in Hampton, Va. on Jan. 27 to ask what might happen if the shuttle's tires were not inflated during a landing attempt.

NASA spokesman Keith Henry said the question was based on assumptions that damage to the shuttle's thermal protection system would cause the tires to deflate. The Langley experts said such a failure could cause broad damage to the shuttle's tires.

The evidence released so far suggests Columbia's troubles began in the left wing where a chunk of foam insulation struck shortly after liftoff on Jan. 16. As the shuttle headed home 16 days later, temperatures in that area rose and sensors began failing in the final eight minutes of flight.

Part of the left wing has been found.

During the board's first news conference in Houston on Tuesday, Gehman wouldn't speculate on the cause of the shuttle's demise. "We don't have favorite theories. We're pursuing everything," he said.



He did say he was convinced the inquiry would determine the cause.

NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe was on Capitol Hill on Wednesday and assured lawmakers, who had questioned NASA's close ties to the board, that the board would be able to act with genuine independence.

During its stay in Florida, the board plans to visit the facility that manufactures thermal protection tiles for the shuttle.

The silica tiles are based on a material first developed by Lockheed chemist Robert Beasley and originally produced at Lockheed's plant in Sunnyvale, Calif. From the earliest tests, some tiles fell off the orbiter.

Even so, production and installation became so refined that work was later done at Kennedy Space Center and elsewhere.

SEAN M. HADDAD/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sean O'Keefe, head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), testifies before a joint session of House and Senate space panels on Capitol Hill yesterday. O'Keefe assured investigators that NASA will discover the cause of the accident that killed seven astronauts and that a review board will operate without interference from NASA insiders.

Cigarette causes Van Meter fire

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

A fire broke out in Van Meter Hall last night after a cigarette left in a trashcan set the can ablaze.

According to the Amherst Fire Department, the cause of the fire was a cigarette left in and contained by one of the room's gray University of Massachusetts supplied trashcans.

The student, suphomore K. Kiernan Lenaghen, had left the cigarette in the trash and headed to the Franklin Dining Common for dinner.

When third floor residents Masha Zayas and Steve Arnold began to smell and witness smoke coming from under the door, they pulled the fire alarm outside of their rooms.

"We weren't sure what to do at first," Zayas said. "So we pulled the alarm."

Van Meter resident Rich Ambach said he was walking up the hill to Van Meter when he saw flames in Lenaghen's window. When he went inside, he heard the fire alarm sound.

Students were herded out of the building into the cold and then up to the hill that faces the back of the dormitory by University of Massachusetts Police.

Resident Director John Yahn came out a few minutes after the students, asking if anyone knew where Lenaghen or his roommate was.

Lenaghen's friend Dennis Carroll, also a sophomore, knew Lenaghen had gone to the dining hall and ran down the hill to bring him back. Upon returning, Lenaghen found three fire trucks and several police vehicles on site.

"I left my room, somebody came down to get me at the DC, I came back up," Lenaghen said. "When I was eating and somebody came and told me my room was on fire it scared the pants off of me."

The trashcan melted into the carpet, causing janitors to have to remove two panels of carpet from his room. Lenaghen will be charged for the panels.

Lenaghen's roommate had been gone the entire day, he said, so if his roommate receives any penalty or bill for damage from the University, he will claim that responsibility as well.

"Apparently, someone broke into my room, smoked a cigarette in there and then put it out in there," Lenaghen said sarcastically of the charges.

Alumni Association to introduce license plate house" plate has earned $7.5 million since 1996, with the money going to Cape Cod preservation.

DETAILS STILL UNDER CONSIDERATION

After getting a commitment from supporters, the next step will be choosing a design to fit in the roughly two-by-three inch space allotted for the image.

Mattei said the design process will be challenging and several options are being explored. While the campus seal has not been ruled out, Mattei said its close resemblance to the Massachusetts state seal would likely cause confusion.

Other considerations include the maroon and black "UM" logo, a landmark such as the Old Chapel or an athletic logo.

"We need a design that identifies us as a campus," Mattei said. "Our goal is to support the university and to do that we have to sell thousands of plates."

She said she remembers what former basketball coach John Calipari always said, that athletics are the front porch of the university. Once you're in the front door, you get the whole university.

"The athletic mark on television is probably the most widely seen and known, so naturally this has to be one of our considerations," said Mattei.

Mattei said the Alumni Association is considering partnering with the athletic department to use the same marketing firm hired by Athletic Director Ian McCaw to freshen the athletic logo.

Mattei also said since the athletic logo is currently being updated, a decision would not be made until it is unveiled, which will likely be this spring. She also said focus groups are being considered as a way to get feedback for design.

"This program will keep alumni connected to the university," Mattie said.

"Right now about 20,000 plates are sold annually which raise approximately $500,000 per year for scholarships," said Waembier.

"We have a large and enthusiastic alumni group," Lombardi said. "We expect a UMass-Amherst license plate would be a fun thing and over time generate some significant support for our students."

McVeigh had supremacy link

By John Solomon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – FBI investigators in the Oklahoma City bombing gathered evidence linking Timothy McVeigh to white supremacists who the government had been told before the bombing were threatening to attack government buildings, investigative memos show.

Several of the documents were not provided to the bomber's defense before he was convicted. And the FBI agent in charge of the investigation says he never received one teletype from his own headquarters that raised the possibility McVeigh was aided by other accomplices.

"They short-circuited the search for the truth," McVeigh's original attorney, Stephen Jones, said in an interview. "I don't doubt Tim's role in the conspiracy. But I think he clearly aggrandized his role, enlarged it, to cover for others who were involved."

McVeigh was executed in June 2001.

Evidence gathered by The Associated Press includes hotel receipts, a speeding ticket, prisoner interviews, informant reports and phone records that suggest McVeigh had contact with a white supremacist compound in Oklahoma known as Elohim City and that members there were familiar with his plan.

"It is suspected that members of Elohim City are involved either directly or indirectly through conspiracy," federal agents wrote in one memo just days after McVeigh detonated a truck bomb April 19, 1995, outside the Alfred P. Murrah federal building in Oklahoma City and killed more than 160 people.

The documents also include a teletype from FBI headquarters in August 1996 that reported McVeigh called Elohim City two weeks before his bombing, a call to a home where members of a violent Aryan Nation bank robbery gang were present.

McVeigh made the call April 5, 1995, moments after calling the Ryder truck company where he rented the truck that carried his deadly bomb. The government had known from an informant weeks before McVeigh's call that members of Elohim City were threatening an attack, the documents show.

The FBI teletype revealed that the gang members who were present when McVeigh called were familiar with explosives and had made a videotape three months before McVeigh struck vowing a war against the federal government and promising a "courthouse massacre."

The Murrah Building was across the street from the federal courthouse in Oklahoma City.

The teletype also noted that two of the robbers left Elohim City on April 16 for a location in Kansas a few hours from where McVeigh was doing the final assembly of his bomb.

"I did not see that teletype," retired agent Dan Defenbaugh, who supervised the Oklahoma City investigation, told AP.

Defenbaugh said that while he didn't consider the teletype a "smoking gun" that would have changed the outcome of the probe, his investigative team "shouldn't have been cut out. We should have been kept in on all the items of the robbery investigation until it was resolved as connected or not connected to Oklahoma City."

Defenbaugh said he also was surprised to learn, from AP interviews and documents, that prosecutors in 1996 made and then withdrew a plea bargain offer to one of the imprisoned bank robbers, Peter Kevin Langan, who claimed he had information about the Oklahoma City bombing.

"The Justice Department came to us through the assistant U.S. attorney and said, 'We believe your client knows about Oklahoma City and we want to talk to him. We want to work out a deal,'" Langan's lawyer, Kevin Durkin, told the AP.

Langan made several demands the government wasn't willing to meet, and prosecutors dropped the request, Durkin said.

Durkin said his client has information about the Oklahoma City bombing, and had planned to tell prosecutors that he could disprove the April 19 alibis for two of the bank robbers mentioned in the FBI teletype.

Langan recently asked a court to stop the government from destroying evidence he claims may be relevant to the Oklahoma City case. A document obtained by AP on Wednesday shows the FBI was ordered by prosecutors to destroy evidence from the robbery, including the videotape, even though appeals were pending.

FBI officials acknowledged some of the documents were not provided to McVeigh's defense team before his trial. For instance, they said FBI teletypes were not covered by the agreement governing documents to be given to McVeigh's defense.

They also acknowledged that agents suspected at one point that the bomber was linked to Elohim City and the Aryan Nation bank robbers.

But they said that after more than 1 million investigative hours that generated more than 1 billion documents and checked 43,000 tips, FBI agents found no concrete evidence of McVeigh conspirators beyond Terry Nichols, who is in federal prison.

"Every lead, regardless of its credibility, was thoroughly investigated to its conclusions," spokesman Mike Kortan said Wednesday. "While conspiracy stories continue to circulate, no evidence that other individuals were involved in the bombing was corroborated by the investigation."

United States war position must include our voice

A new audio tape allegedly containing the most recent commands of Osama bin Laden was revealed this week, and further evidence uncovered yesterday suggests that the United States government had known of its existence – and supposed authenticity – long before the message fell into the public sphere.

The message was broadcast on Tuesday, carried out over the air on the Arab satellite network Al Jazeera, and called for a seemingly contradictory partnership between Muslims and Saddam Hussein's Ba'ath Party – long thought to be at bitter ends – against the United States and its impending military strikes. maneuvers which grow by the day into a state of "when" and not "if."

To compound that variable relationship even further, the CIA revealed this week that intelligence suggest an al-Qaeda attack could be imminent on U.S. grounds. The announcement, coming one week after the national terror alert was raised to "orange," cites a wide survey of individuals with "strong ties" to al-Qaeda, though CIA Director George J. Tenet could offer no further details.

In the brisk and sudden pace of just a few days, a common concern for both domestic and global affairs has multiplied to an almost infinite level as new "sources" and "intelligence" continue to place our collective well-being on the brink of absolute disaster. Certainly these are precarious time and each of us should consider that appropriately, but left to reason alone, it's often too broad a concept to digest. We have only circumstantial hearsay. Alleged tapes. Possible connections. The color orange.

No further information.

It's been written in this space before, but can't be said enough: our government needs to widen its breadth to include the people it, in theory, serves.

There is without a doubt an enormous amount of care to be afforded to the situation by our government – more so than we could hope to wholly understand and more so than we would care to admit. However, a broadcast in the vein of what took place over Arab airwaves is a jolt to the awareness of this country and the citizens who rightly expect to be reassured with and informed, even at the basic level, of the problems being compacted and thus affecting daily life.

President George W. Bush has taken his "if you're not with us, you're with them" routine around this country and back again, warming some to the cause and reinforcing to others how singular his one-trick show is. If it's a statement he and the rest of his peers in the government endorse, however, then he should be subjected to the same standards and resulting classifications. With so little information provided, with so little attention given to those voicing an opinion to the contrary, the Bush administration doesn't seem to be with anyone but themselves, and that can only serve to hurt everyone as time goes on, more than either of the two options above would suggest.

The 'Blair Snitch' Project

Mark Ostroff

It feels good to know that Massachusetts isn't the only place to have budget problems. British intelligence along with U.S. collaborators now relies on magazine clippings and stolen, impertinent and outdated articles from academia to somehow justify a war to the world.

When Secretary of State Colin Powell introduced the document, "Iraq: Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception, and Intimidation" to the UN, he announced, "What we're giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence."

Man oh man, was he wrong.

Parts of the 19-page document had turned out to be plagiarized so crudely that the original authors' typing mistakes were still in the report.

One of the authors, a post-graduate student named Ibrahim al-Marashi, wasn't exactly flattered. After calling the British scandal "wholesale deception," he also commented, "How can the British trust the Government if it is up to these sorts of tricks?"

Author William Rivers Pitt had also pointed out that although segments of al-Marashi's report had been simply cut and pasted, British intelligence officials thought it would be better to inflate their case by changing certain key words from his report.

The al-Marashi report claims that Iraqi intelligence is "monitoring foreign embassies in Iraq." However, the British report says Iraqi intelligence is "spying on foreign embassies in Iraq."

Another point that al-Marashi had made was that Saddam Hussein had been known to support "opposition groups." The statements that appeared in the British report were almost verbatim, except that the word "terrorist" had replaced "opposition" in the plagiarized statements.

Clever, huh?

And then there is Sean Boyne.

Boyne is a journalist for the military magazine, Jane's Intelligence Review. Speaking to reporters, he commented, "I don't like to think that anything I wrote has been used as an argument for war," adding, "I am concerned because I am against the war." I guess he wasn't exactly flattered either.

Another interesting statement was that both of these men claim that not only were their statements exaggerated and used out of context, but also any quantitative figures they had presented were actually inflated. I find it a surprise that Blair and Bush would stoop so low as to sell out the dignity of their respective countries in exchange for their ulterior motives, but this is far from the first time this game has been played.

According to the UK Guardian, "Successive U.S. governments have a poor record of misleading their own citizens on foreign policy issues at least since the Vietnam War."

Well, so much for an informed public.

What was the motivation behind such a shoddy report? Did Bush and Blair expect to keep the world leaders in the dark? It leaves me to wonder if there is any more rubbish that they put into Iraq's dossier that is getting kicked over to the Security Council. And in return, those leaders will now have to assess the evidence themselves to see what is accurate and what is just plain bygus.

The more ironic aspect of this all is that every time Iraq hands us a declaration or a document, the boys over at the C.I.A and Pentagon rate its quality and consistency to that of a L. Ron Hubbard novel. I can only imagine how much credibility these two "intelligence" agencies will have now.

Saddam Hussein claims that the evidence against his regime consists of "cheap lies." Well folks, there are, in fact, lies in this report and they were pretty cheap ones too. Is there really room in this kind of a crisis for self-serving hypocrisy?

What kind of a leader actually tries to lie and plagiarize for the sake of starting a war, regardless of their reasoning behind it? This can only be the work of somebody who doesn't value any life but his own and sees humans as an expendable tool toward a selfish agenda.

With the evidence against Iraq, Saddam is not the only one who is on trial here. The men and women of our armed forces are on trial. Innocent Iraqi women and children are on trial. American values are on trial.

If, in fact, there is incontrovertible justification for an attack on Iraq, then let it be known. This way, we can work to find a way to live with the obligations of protecting ourselves while trying our best to support our friends, families and American values.

If we lie and cheat our way through, then many of those people, as well as what America stands for, will be wrongfully sentenced to a vain and worthless death.

Chancellor's Ball didn't waste a dime

Jamie Loo

It's a week later but I'm still feeling a little sad. One of the biggest parties of the year took place last Thursday and I did not get my invitation.

And I've written so many nice things about you Chancellor Lombardi.

Actually, I've been informed that the invitations for many student leaders were given out late, with RSVP dates after they had been received, or were lost in general. I'll give you the benefit of the doubt; I bet mine is floating around somewhere in the Student Union. You're forgiven.

What's really annoying me though, isn't that I missed the Chancellor's Ball, but instead is the amount of grumbling I've been hearing from students about the costs of the Ball. After years of budget cuts, it should be obvious to the informed UMass student that funding for the school doesn't come out of one big account. Nor does the Chancellor's house have a Scrooge McDuck-like vault in its basement where Lombardi and Whitmore administrators go swimming.

Every time there's something big that requires a lot of money on this campus, students flip out and complain that we're in a budget crisis and that the money can be used better. While these allegations are not too far fetched, some of the conclusions they're jumping to are completely incorrect, especially when it comes to private donors.

Return with me, if you will, to former interim chancellor Marcie Williams' "UMass family analogy." Dad, mom and the kids. Suzy SOM, Ian Integrated Science and James Journalism all have their own money and spend the money as they choose. One day, Grandpa Alfond from Maine comes to visit and says, "Hey, I want to give some money to the family to fix up the business school. Here's $1 million Suzy. You can't share with your brother and sister though, it's only for you and your friends." Suzy SOM is sad that the family is in financial trouble but she can't do anything about it. Grandpa said it's only for her and he knows that in the long run the school will help other business minded students. Besides, other people might look more favorably on the family if their home is improved with the new business school. So the family struggles onward as the new business school is built. Then suddenly, the Mahoney cousins decide to help Ian out and give him $2 million for a new integrated sciences building. But Ian can't share with James Journalism, Suzy SOM or mom and dad. The Mahoneys say it's only for the integrated sciences and in the long run, it will make the school better and might encourage more donors to give money to the school. Even if the roads and classrooms need repairs and services have to be trimmed back, it doesn't matter. The money isn't for those things; it's for exactly what the donors tell us it's for. People have said, "Well, can't we tell the donors to give money to the school in general?" I invite those people to look donors in the eye and turn down $2 million for their own majors, for the common good of the school. We take what we can get and run with it. In the end, these donations to the individual schools will help build the reputation of the school and generate more money.

"Nor does the chancellor's house have a Scrooge McDuck-like vault in its basement where Lombardi and Whitmore administrators go swimming."

The Chancellor's Ball was no exception to the donor standards. Most of the Chancellor's Ball was funded by private donors who specifically donated money for the inauguration festivities. Not for fixing yellow lot. Not for getting another professor. For the inauguration only. The University even went the extra mile by creating a website just for the inauguration. The website was very open about the amount of money that went into the event, even listing some of the sponsors. As a journalism major, my math isn't great but I crunched the numbers on the site to see what I could come up with.

The UMass Alumni Association tossed in $50,000 for the event. Then there were the private donors. In total there were 79 donors who gave $1,000 or more, in addition to 19 benefactors who gave less than a thousand. These donors include administrators, staff and companies such as Dell Computers, Coca-Cola bottling company of Greenfield, Raytheon, Eastman Kodak Company, Fleet Bank and AT&T. In total, this set of donors contributed $185,000, which is over double what the Alumni Association contributed. The inauguration committee probably saved some money by holding the event at the Mullins Center and by utilizing the university catering services instead of an outside caterer.

And not all of this money was even used up to pay for the event. Money left over from these donors was used to create the Chancellor's Merit Scholarship Fund, which will begin supporting students, starting with the class of 2007. Another $55,000 was set aside specifically for these scholarships from private donors; not the university. In the long run the students benefited from the event and will continue to through this scholarship fund. The people that attended this event could potentially donate money to the university in the future too.

So, if you're still complaining about the Chancellor's Ball and how much it cost, you should just shove it. You should be proud of the fact that there are a lot of people that like our chancellor enough to throw him a party. He's a cool guy and deserves to have a big welcoming party for the big things he's going to do for this school. So stop griping, the money didn't come out of your wallet.

The real trouble with men

Sanam Hakim

Ladies, let me ask you a question: what is the most frustrating part of your life? Ah yes, men – how could we live without them? Well, very happily I'd imagine. It's like my roommate says, "Men are like copiers, you need them for reproduction, but that's about it."

Now, making guys look bad is like breathing. Ninety-nine percent of the time it occurs automatically. Sometimes you hold your breath until you turn purple, then you have to inhale...and inhale...and inhale again. No matter how hard you try, you always have to breathe. I thought I'd outline some things that irritate me the most about guys.

Christmas or birthday shopping. What a woman wants is simple: something to show her friends. Guys, as much as you'd like to believe that girls run home and try on their new "ill-fitting panties" to each other, it just doesn't happen. In fact, I think I'd rather buy myself some flowers and slap your name on the card then show my friends my new "birthday panties." You got one thing right though – smiling is very important in the gift giving process. But fellas, beware: when you hold up your girl's new panties, your stupid grin doesn't say, "I hope you like it." It says, "Why don't you try these on for daddy so I can show you what I'm smilin' about!" Chocolate, a teddy bear or even a stupid e-card goes a lot further than you think. So put the panties back and buy her an "I'm with stupid" shirt, because after a gift like that, she'd probably use the shirt more.

"So put the panties back and buy her an 'I'm with stupid' shirt, because, after a gift like that, she'd probably use the shirt more."

Which brings me to my next point: unrealistic expectations. I don't ask you to make out with your roommate, so why should I make out with mine? And ladies, don't fall for the puppy eyes and the "please" with thirty e's in it. Chances are, he's seen it before. Hooking up with another girl is not showing him you care; it's humoring his idiotic fantasies.

While we're on the idiot subject, I don't understand why guys think girls are complex. I think the issue here is not an issue of complexity, but rather an issue of stupidity. If your girl knows when you're upset, it doesn't make you simple, it makes her smart. Likewise, when your girl is upset and you don't realize it, it doesn't make her complex, it makes you stupid.

To wrap this up, I think that guys have a really hard time detecting sarcasm. For somebody as sarcastic as me, I get in trouble with this frequently. I'm not worried about getting a deluge of angry e-mails from males though, because they're all probably sitting back right now, sippin' a Bud, calling me a complex creature and wondering "what I REALLY meant when I said 'idiot'."

Ideal of love is lost in the holiday

Paige Cram

It's that time of year again: Valentine's Day, a holiday that is year in and year out met with mixed emotions. While for some people it is a day to celebrate love and romance, for many others it is the most dreaded day of the year. So what is Feb. 14 really all about? Most people know it had something to do with a guy named Valentine, but beyond that the general public seems to be clueless.

The true story is that St. Valentine was a Roman priest who was caught performing marriages in secret after marriage had been outlawed by the Emperor. For his crime he was sentenced to death, and while in jail, he fell in love with the warden's daughter, who came to visit him every day. Shortly before his execution, he left a letter for the girl expressing his love and appreciation and signed it "Your Valentine," thus sending the very first Valentine's Day card.

But I think it is safe to say that Feb. 14 is no longer a celebration of St. Valentine and his courageous efforts. If it was, surely a few more people would know his story instead of responding that they have no idea what he did to become so legendary. No, Valentine's Day has come to represent something else entirely.

I, myself, have never been a big fan of the holiday. To me, it never seemed to represent anything except a day for the greeting card and flower industries to make money. It's a day for single people to feel lonely, for the broken-hearted to feel pain and for the ones in relationships to have to force some romance on a specific day. For me, the romance is kind of lost when it's expected. Call me a cynic, but I'd much rather be surprised on a random day when I knew it was done completely of free will.

And even if the day did originally start out as a celebration of love and romance, it's been so commercialized that it has begun to lose its meaning.

I'm sure St. Valentine could never have imagined that Hallmark and FTD would someday make a fortune off of his attempts to save the sanctity of marriage.

"I'm sure St. Valentine could never have imagined the Hallmark and FTD would someday make a fortune off of his attempts to save the sanctity of marriage."

On the other hand, there is something to be said for the ideals on which it is based. Love is one of the driving forces of life. Our ability to love is part of what sets us apart as human, and what better than a day to simply rejoice in the fact that we can feel something so fantastic. As far as expression of that feeling to others, I've always been a strong believer in making sure that people who are important to me know it, no matter what day of the year it is. But we all slip up sometimes, and more often than not I think we assume that those around us just know we care about them. And maybe they do, but it's still a good idea to take time out once and a while and remind them.

Okay, so maybe Valentine's Day isn't such a bad idea after all. Maybe it just needs a little reform so that everyone can enjoy and appreciate it.

If I could celebrate Valentine's Day my own way, the first thing to go would be gift giving. Don't get me wrong, presents are great, but I resent the commercials that are aired during Valentine's Day. My least favorite is the one for Kay Jewelers. First of all, the phrase "every kiss" does not begin with "k," it begins with "e." And secondly, what exactly are they implying? That every kiss a couple shares starts with the giving of an expensive diamond bracelet? Not every girl is that materialistic. That's not to say that we wouldn't appreciate jewelry, but it's certainly not expected. Personally, I'd much rather see a creative way of conveying those three little words. Nothing says 'I love you' like actually putting time and thought into a gift.

The other change I would make to Valentine's Day is to expand what it includes. Why stop at only recognizing romantic love? What about love for friends? Family? I'd like to think that most of us have at least one person in our lives that we can say we love, in one way or another. And like I said, it's always nice to remind those people that you care. So if you are in a relationship, good for you. Enjoy it, but don't forget to also give recognition to the people who support you when that relationship isn't going so well. And if you're not in a relationship, there's no need to fret because if you take a look around you I'm sure you'll realize there are plenty of people you are grateful for. Just because you don't have a significant other doesn't mean you don't have a valentine. I, myself, am lucky enough to have many people in my life that I am grateful for, and this year, I'm considering them all to be my valentines.

So, the way I see it, Feb. 14 isn't about candy hearts and flowers. It's about appreciating that love which St. Valentine was trying to preserve, no matter what form it comes in.

Heavenly aphrodisiacs a recipe for fun

Micrology

Jessica Pelletier

That's right lovers, Valentine's Day is coming upon us quicker than a sleazy drunk in a nightclub, and nothing arouses a healthy libido like a good dose of aphrodisiacs. A general definition for aphrodisiacs would be any food, drink, drug, scent or device that supposedly improves sexual performance. The origin of the word comes from the Greek goddess of sexual love and beauty, Aphrodite, whose realm of the sea has caused many a bottom-dwelling mollusk to umm, yeah, those would be oysters and scallops) to be associated with increased sexual performance.

The Middle Ages ushered in a new form of medical philosophy known as the Doctrine of Signatures. Behind this new line of thinking was the idea that if God had cursed humanity with illnesses, then surely He provided natural cures, which showed themselves to be obvious. Is useful through their "signature." Plants with heart-shaped leaves were used to cure heart disease, yellow plants were used to cure jaundice and marijuana was used to cure productivity. OK, that last claim was fraudulent, but the philosophical school of thought stretched through Europe, Asia and Africa and caused the near extinction of the rhinoceros due to claims that the powdered horn was good for a sluggish phallus.

Spicy foods, such as curry and chili peppers, and caffeinated foods, such as coffee beans and chocolate, have a long-standing reputation for being powerful sexual stimulants due to their potential to cause elevated heart rates and/or sweating, which are similar to the physical reactions experienced during intercourse. However, the popularity of chocolate has waned in the modern era due to the fact that it tends to be easier to locate than a fat man in an empty room.

Often times, however, the side effects of these aphrodisiacs are more deadly than arousing. The most famous example of this would be the illegal stimulant cantharides, a.k.a. Spanish Fly. These dried beetle remains cause increased blood flow to the genitals resulting in severe genitourinary infections and, in large doses, death. And believe me, nothing makes a date hotter than a big, thick piece of death. Am I right ladies? In fact, a 1989 study by the Food and Drug Administration made a statement declaring there is no scientific evidence supporting over-the-counter aphrodisiacs and their effectiveness in treating sexual dysfunction. Furthermore, a medical professional, and not a large plate of oysters Rockefeller, should treat suspected sexual dysfunction.

So, what in the name of folklore-based chicanery are we to do? The answer may come as shocks to everyone – stop eating this stupid trash. That's right, the University of California at San Diego recently conducted a study in which 95 healthy, sedentary men were divided into two groups and given either light or intense exercise. Nine months later both groups reported increases in sexual desire, with the intense workout group expressing the largest increase in carnal amusement. Duke University conducted a similar study, which monitored the weight loss and sexual desire of 70 men, ages 18 to 65, and found that all reported desire increases after a reduction in weight ranging from eight to 30 pounds. Conclusion? Additional, unnecessary poundage leads to feelings of stress and anxiety. Weight loss of any form increases energy that can potentially be used for a happy bedroom experience. But even this study discounts the reality that millions of overweight people engage in healthy sexual activity, and merely suggests that a dietary change carries the potential for improvement.

Perhaps John Reimer, founder of the Consumer Health Information Research Institute, was right when he said, "the mind is the most potent aphrodisiac there is." Remember, all the powdered roots and herbs in the world can't compensate for personal feelings of inadequacy, and the two sexiest things in a partner are confidence and competence. So, I hope everyone reading has a happy V-Day — with or without the rhino horn.

50 Cent goes a long way on first release

By Dan Bourgeois
Collegian Correspondent

New York's 50 Cent loves the bad guy role, and he wants the world to know it. With a voice that loosely combines Mase's laid back flow with Beanie Sigel's baritone and emotion, 50 has a unique balance of style and substance. About five years ago, he came on the scene with one time Bad Boy producer "D-Dot" (under the guise of the Madd Rapper) with the single "How to Rob," which served as premeditated robbers of many of the day's biggest rappers. Though it got a little airplay on hip-hop stations, it's safe to say it did not go over well with his "victims." Art imitated life when Ja Rule got robbed three years ago and 50 was seen with the culprit shortly thereafter, starting an ongoing feud between 50, Ja Rule and his Murder Inc. label.

50 Cent
'Get Rich or Die Trying'
Shady/Aftermath Records

After being shot nine times in 2000 and dropped from his label, Sony shortly thereafter, 50 seemed to be at the end of his career. But 50 hit the underground. Lyrically sharp and constantly making songs with his group, G Unit, 50 became an underground success, and his hunger and determination could be heard on every freestyle he spit and every song he released underground. Last summer Eminem stumbled upon a mix tape of 50's work and fell in love with it. In no time, 50 became the newest rapper on Em and Dre's Shady/Aftermath label, and his first two singles, "Wanksta" and "In Da Club" have turned him into a hip-hop heavyweight virtually overnight.

"Get Rich or Die Tryin'" is 50's full-length debut. By the time you read this, the album will be close to selling its first million copies. But does it live up to its expectations? The first real test comes early on the CD in the form of "Patiently Waiting," featuring Eminem, who also produced the track. 50 holds his own against one of the best in the game today, and the outcome is an instant classic, full of sharp rhymes and emotion that are reminiscent of Em's "Marshall Mathers LP."

But 50 proves throughout the album that he can do it by himself

It's 'Business as Usual' for the Men at Work on latest LP

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Men at Work loomed large in my childhood legend. The patchy verses of "Down Under" were coughed up daily through the tinny speakers of the radio that sat on the kitchen counter, leaving me to wait as the sound carried its way across the surface and poured down the side. Summer afternoons, 1985, my Mother cleaning the house and myself dancing in the carefree shadow, joining her in an occasional reprise of the only words I knew: "Can't you hear, can't you hear the thunder? / You better run, you better take cover."

Eighteen years later, it sounds just as good, and the luck of the recently re-issued debut, "Business As Usual," tells me as much. "...all these years later, it's still tastier than a vegemite sandwich." Maybe, but let's back this up a minute. An entire debut album? You're telling me the men stayed home from work long enough to cut an album's worth of rock standards and pop gems? This is simply too much. Literally.

Men At Work
'Business As Usual'
Columbia

As if the musical landscape in 2003 weren't already abstract enough – the amalgamation of saccharine pop quartets and Nu Rawk bands sounding only slightly less pleasant that the static procured in your car between counties – along come the Men at Work re-issues. Re-mastered and dolled up with four extra tracks apiece, culled mostly from studio leftovers and the odd live show, there's a lot here to remember – and a bit of what's caused us to forget as the last decade slipped past.

The obvious classic notwithstanding, there are a few tracks in the depths of "Business As Usual" that start someplace kind and end up in a similarly benevolent frame of mind. "Who Can it be Now?" always sounded to me like the lovechild Sting bore with some mistress rhythm section while domestic friction was busy tearing apart The Police. In its proper context, however, the four-point sax melody that jumpstarts the song and mimics the chorus sums up both the album and a career. The skipping beats, stuttering guitars and hiccuping vocals that shape the album's larger arc are put to their most melodic use here. "People Just Love To Play With Words," however, suffers from a distinctively opposite problem; an entirely bland take, the verses run aimlessly to the chorus, leaving something more suitable for TV Land Primetime than a proper place among the album's otherwise awkwardly strong tracks.

"Helpless Automaton" may well be the best of the bunch – a blend of organic rock and vocals blinded by science, it also boasts a charming lack of horns that allows the track to explore its own space.

The four extras tagged to the end of the album, setting the album apart from its original shape, are a mixed bag. The five "Who Can it Be Now?" is there to remind us the band had some stage chops, while "F-19"," as one of the two, non-LP B-side's, swings confidently enough and plunges into just the right minor diversions to avoid rote repetition; it wouldn't have set the world on fire then, and it won't now, but as a freebee bookend to an eclectic set like this, it makes an odd amount of sense.

I'm left shocked on this one – afraid, somehow, that I've been tricked or that my better senses (whatever was there to begin with) have up and left me. Little did I know in '85 that behind a radio novelty stood an album of some decent merit – not my particular taste, but better than most of what crawled out of the decade. And really, how often did a band in that day and age have the good sense to foresee the place they'd someday land? "Hello to you my young sweet friends, have you got money you could perhaps lend? / I wash my leather face in the afternoon sun, my shirt's torn and my time's near done."

'Men at Work' continue tradition of coolness with new LP

Despite Chan and Wilson, 'Shanghai Knights' tanks

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

'Shanghai Knights'
Directed by David Dobkin
Starring Jackie Chan, Owen Wilson
Touchstone
110 mins

A good buddy film needs a well-oiled pairing to succeed. It needs to pair up an odd couple with the right yin and yang chemistry so the continuous give and take doesn't wear out its welcome too quickly. It needs a dynamic duo to transcend the stale formula of a genre that has existed, unchanged, since the heyday of Bob Hope and Bing Crosby. It needs a pair whose ease together makes the pain of watching another odd couple action film go down easier.

The 1994 hit "Shanghai Noon" sent Jackie Chan, the Buster Keaton of high-flying martial arts cinema, into the Old West and paired him with Owen Wilson, the young actor whose laconic, stoned-surfer dude delivery made him the unlikeliest cowboy to straddle a horse and ride off into the sunset.

Chan and Wilson played off each other as beautifully as Chan and Chris Tucker did in the "Rush Hour" movies, with Chan's athletically comic grace bouncing off of and bounding itself to Wilson's quirky line readings and air of intelligent slacker indifference. Chan, as Chinese imperial guard Chon Wang, proved a perfect match for Wilson, in the role of Roy O'Bannon, quite possibly the west's worst gunfighter.

"Shanghai Knights," the latest it-had-to-happen-sooner-or-later sequel, teams Chan and Wilson once more in hopes of conjuring more of that magic from the first time around. But, despite their best efforts, that old magic disappeared in a puff of smoke.

As a comedy, "Shanghai Knights" is an almost complete failure: long, and tiring. Chon Wang's father, protector of the imperial seal, is murdered and the seal stolen by the villainous Lord Rathbone (Aidan Gillen), a bitter British Royal tenth in line for the throne. Chon, now the sheriff in a Nevadan desert town, reunites with O'Bannon in New York before the duo head to London for revenge and the seal. Meanwhile, O'Bannon decides to use the opportunity to hit on Chon's lovely sister (Fann Wong).

"Shanghai Knights" is a pile-up of tired jokes – jokes about the weather, about poor dental hygiene, about palace guards, about strange culinary traditions, along with roles for Arthur Conan Doyle and Charlie Chaplin. Action sequences take place in –

'Knights' no good

"Shanghai Knights" is weak despite Chan and Wilson.

where else? - Big Ben and the Buckingham palace. It appears as though the behind the scenes folks were intent on purposefully avoiding any semblance of wit or comic ingenuity. Even Wilson, who delights in improving and tweaking even the most banal of lines, is lost here - more so than in "Lips," a similarly weary buddy film that at least had a genuine rapport between its stars. Here, the chemistry is as gone as the humor, the plot is arthritic and sluggish and in need of retirement.

That leaves Chan to carry the weight. The one smart thing Director David Dobkin does is to stand back and let Chan do his thing. Dobkin tips his hat to silent legends such as Keaton by explicitly putting forth the Chan-as-ballet dancer metaphor that movies have speculated about, but kept implicit. The single best fight scene even recalls the fancy footwork of "Singin' in the Rain," with Chan dueling street ruffians in a dirt-poor alley. There is also a sequence set in Madame Tussaud's wax museum and another fairly funny one set in a treasure filled chamber.

Even with Chan dancing and whirling and trying his might to pump energy into the frailty that surrounds him, "Shanghai Knights" turns into a depressing experience. In fact, the movie's funniest moments come during the end when the blooper reel runs. There is also some pretty production design here but not enough to salvage a movie that suffers a few too many dry stretches to qualify as mindless fun.

Chocano's take on dating

the type of person who would denounce Adam Sandler movies due to their "lack of cinematic integrity." Beneath all the jokes and sarcasm, this book does contain grains of truth. People who discover they have crushes on other people tend to focus on every word the crush says, and that's all there is to it.

From the beginning steps of analyzing what you want in a partner to the final void, which accompanies a breakup, Chocano shimmies and shakes her vocabulary around topics that are treated with an absurd seriousness in Cosmopolitan magazines. Honestly, is there a woman reading this right now that needs to know the top 30 flirting tips for February? How about smiling and keeping a closer eye on personal hygiene – do you think that might work? The finer points of communication are discussed as well. For example, most people tend to bristle when they hear phrases varying from "don't take this the wrong way." to "the doctor says it's just a rash."

But if there is only one tidbit of information you take from this guidebook, get it from the section on breakups. Yes, it is possible for people who have ended a relationship to remain friends, but sometimes it's OK to accept that this is not the best of decisions in your case. For example, having lunch with an ex is a potentially disastrous situation due in part to the fact that if you could still be friendly with one another, you'd still be together. What does the guide suggest you do in such a case? Skip the lunch and go directly to breakup sex. It leaves no unnecessary small talk, and at least you'll both be doing something productive. Let's see your best friend try to get away with giving you that kind of advice.

Unquestionably, this book was written for a female audience, but discerning young men can gather hilarious nuggets of truth behind the female psyche as well. And it's important to point out right now that no two females are alike – anyone who claims they are most likely has the adjectives chauvinist and loser associated with their name. Still, all's fair in love and war, so strap on your rocket launchers ladies; it's datin' time.

egotistical about it. Whoever I bang is bangin' me back!"

Besides Farrell, Spears has reportedly been spending a lot of time with Limp Bizkit frontman Fred Durst, and was spotted once again canoodling with Timberlake. Recent reports, however, state Durst has separated himself from Spears. Did he do it all for the nookie?

Timberlake's certainly not crying a river over any of this. Since his split with Spears, he's been linked to dancer Jenna Dewan, Alyssa Milano and Janet Jackson.

Fellow ex-Mouseketeer Aguilera, who has left little to the imagination with her barely-there get-ups, is dating the Thong man himself, Sisqo, according to US Weekly magazine.

You'll want to clear out any earwax before hearing the next one. US Weekly reports that Nicole Kidman and rapper Q-Tip were seen together over sushi at the trendy Tribeca Japanese eatery in downtown New York. A friend of Q-Tip tells the magazine that he and Kidman "have been kicking it for over a month now," and met through their mutual friend Leonardo DiCaprio.

But remember Hollywood's motto of "together today, not tomorrow." By the time Valentine's Day arrives, these stars may not be going out, let alone seeing someone else. Cupid aims and shoots his arrows at stars like nobody's business.

Except ours.

50 Cent worth it

just as well. Standout tracks include "Many Men (Wish Death)," "Like My Style" and the la Rule diss "Back Down." The best track, however, is "Heat." Over a Dre-produced masterpiece that consists of a call-and-response beat between an organ note and a gunshot, 50 spits clever threats at anyone who has ever entertained the thought of going up against him.

50 doesn't deviate far from the theme of "Heat," with the exception of "21 Questions" that displays a different side of rap's realest artist. The constant theme could equally help and hurt the album, because even though it shows that 50 stays true to form, it may also make the album wear thin on some listeners quickly. It's this fact that makes the album's length an issue. Though there aren't any particularly weak songs, the album's 19 tracks, as a whole, seem to run about three or four songs too long, making the album a little repetitious and some of the songs tough to separate from one another.

Lyrically, 50 Cent is consistent throughout the album, but shines brightest on the final two bonus cuts, which highlight the intensity, humor and craftiness that drew Eminem to 50 in the first place. On the last track, "Life's on the Line," 50 boasts, "Now here's a list of MC's that can kill you in eight bars/ 50, umm, Jay-Z and Nas." This is a difficult statement for any of today's rappers, new or old, to back up, and 50 almost pulls it off with ease on "Get Rich or Die Tryin'." Its overall strength is definitely comparable to both rappers' latest releases. This album should place him in a good position to contend with them as the throne's current occupier.

Information on 50 Cent's background was found in The Source Magazine, in the July 2002 issue.

Love got you down? Songs have healing power brings: "I turned and tossed till it seems you have gone/ But here you are with the dawn/ Wish I forget you but you're here to stay/ Stop haunting me now/ Can't shake you now."

"Go Your Own Way," Fleetwood Mac: One part band, one part soap opera, Fleetwood Mac in the late 70s epitomized the dissention and frustration of fading love. You could listen to the entire "Rumours" album and hear one great heartache song after another, but this is the standout track.

"I Know It's Over," The Smiths: In this gorgeous song, Morrissey's hypnotic voice takes you on a journey expounding upon some important truths, mostly the way a past relationship can feel almost like a dream. Those lonely hearts out there can relate to the lyrics: "And you even spoke to me and said/ 'If you're so funny then why are you on your own tonight?/ And if you're so clever why are you on your own tonight?'"

"Lately," Stevie Wonder: "Far more frequently you're wearing perfume/ With you say no special place to go/ But when I ask will you be coming back soon/ You don't know." Have you ever had the feeling your loved one was up to something? You could not prove it; you didn't want to talk about it. Still, something in the way they acted clued you in and ate you up inside. The great Stevie Wonder captures all of those feelings in this spare, piano-based song.

"I.ie," Dream Theater: A terrific unrequited love song from one of my all-time favorite bands. Wrapped around hard-rocking, complex instrumental work are instantly humorous lyrics: "So you tell me 'trust me'/ I can trust you as far as I can throw you/ And I'm trying to get out of a shadow of doubt/ Cause I don't know if I know you."

"Love Is a Hurtin Thing," Lou Rawls: No one can belt out those heartbreak songs better than the soul legends; this one is particularly good.

"Love Stinks," J. Geils Band: Pretty self-explanatory, this song has become a favorite among the broken-hearted. And, of course, who can forget Adam Sandler's version in "The Wedding Singer?"

"One," Aimee Mann: In this wonderful little ode to loneliness off the "Magnolia" soundtrack, one of the best songwriters in music today expresses the emptiness and sorrow of being alone. One is indeed the loneliest number.

"Only the Lonely" and "Crying," Roy Orbison: A pair of gems from the great singer/songwriter.

"Song for the Dumped," Ben Folds Five: Dedicated to all those who have ever been dumped.

"There You Are," The Goo Goo Dolls: "I self-destruct/ I close my eyes/ And there you are." Doesn't it seem like once you are over them, they show up in the most unexpected places?

"With or Without You," U2: Somber, pensive, haunting and depressing, while still managing to maintain the wistfulness and hope we strive to hold on to while we're waiting for that one person to get the message.

"You Outta Know," Alanis Morissette: One of the most painful and frustrating experiences is to fall for someone who is already in love with someone else, and to then be taken on an emotional roller-coaster ride by false promises. This song wonderfully articulates those feelings.

So if you start to let Valentine's Day get you down, line up and blast these gut wrenching and powerful tunes, taking comfort knowing you are not alone, for music has the power to heal.

Best love songs ever guy, do not play this one for a girl on a first (or second or third) date. You might send the wrong message.

REO Speedwagon: "Can't Fight this Feeling"
REO Speedwagon epitomized the 80s power ballad, and "Can't Fight this Feeling" is still a soft rock classic on nighttime radio broadcasting. The lyrics read like a romantic Hallmark card, and it's a must have for any soundtrack to a tender and passionate evening. And if you're flying solo this Valentines Day, it's a good song to sing to your roommate after you've had a couple shots of Smirnoff.

Elvis: "Can't Help Falling in Love with You"
Leaving The King off of this list would be a true travesty, and this touching number is one that has been part of many Valentines Days past. And it should remain a part of any romantic repertoire. From the car ride on the way to a romantic dinner at Spoleto's to a bunch of singles driving down town for a night of bitter boozing, this is a classic Valentines Day number that serves a purpose no matter how you celebrate on Friday.

DJ Sammy featuring Yanou: "Heaven," Candlelight version.
This truly beautiful rendition of the Bryan Adams original is just a delicate solo piano with Yanou's angelic voice serenading the lyrics. It's a great song to sing to any kind of date, whether it is a love interest or a best friend or your goldfish, and its beautiful to boot.

Lauryn Hill: "Tell Him"
By far the best track on Lauryn Hill's "The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill," this song is great for when one is harboring a crush on another, and better when sitting around nuzzling with someone you care about, whether it be a significant other, another single and bitter friend, or the latest edition of "Cosmo." Romantic, simple and very sweet, Hill offers a must have for any Valentines Day soundtrack.

So there you have it, the best love songs to play for yourself or someone else this Valentines Day. These are perfect for any nighttime soundtrack, but have a special meaning this Valentines Day. No matter what your status, a little romantic music makes everything just a little bit more enjoyable.

Depo-Provera®
Contraceptive Injection
medroxyprogesterone acetate injectable suspension

Birth control you think about just 4 x a year.

DEPO-PROVERA

This product is intended to prevent pregnancy. It does not protect against HIV infection (AIDS) and other sexually transmitted diseases.

What is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?

How effective is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?

ONLY if you get your shot every 11 weeks (3 months)
ONLY if you get your shot within 5 days after childbirth if not pregnant at that time

Percent of Women Experiencing an Accidental Pregnancy in the First Year of Continuous Use

Method	Lowest Expected	Typical

Who should not use DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?

- if you have had cancer of the breast
- if you have had a stroke
- if you have or have had blood clots (phlebitis) in your legs
- if you have problems with your liver or liver disease
- if you are allergic to DEPO-PROVERA (medroxyprogesterone acetate or any of its other ingredients)

What other things should I consider before using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
You will have a physical examination before your doctor prescribes DEPO-PROVERA. It is important to tell your health-care provider if you have any of the following:

- a family history of breast cancer
- an abnormal mammogram (breast x-ray), fibrocystic breast disease, breast nodules or lumps, or bleeding from your nipples
- kidney disease
- irregular or scanty menstrual periods
- high blood pressure
- migraine headaches
- asthma
- epilepsy (convulsions or seizures)
- diabetes or a family history of diabetes
- a history of depression

- if you are taking any prescription or over-the-counter medications.

This product is intended to prevent pregnancy. It does not protect against transmission of HIV (AIDS) and other sexually transmitted diseases such as chlamydia, genital herpes, genital warts, gonorrhea, hepatitis B, and syphilis.

What if I want to become pregnant after using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Because DEPO-PROVERA is a long-acting birth control method, it takes some time after your last injection for its effect to wear off. Based on the results from a large study done in the United States, for women who stop using DEPO-PROVERA in order to become pregnant, it is expected that about half of those who become pregnant will do so in about 10 months after their last injection. About two thirds of those who become pregnant will do so in about 12 months; about 83% of those who become pregnant will do so in about 15 months, and about 93% of those who become pregnant will do so in about 18 months after their last injection. The length of time you use DEPO-PROVERA has no effect on how long it takes you to become pregnant after you stop using it.

What are the risks of using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
1 Irregular Menstrual Bleeding
The side effect reported most frequently by women who use DEPO-PROVERA for contraception is a change in their normal menstrual cycle. During the first year of using DEPO-PROVERA you might have one or more of the following changes: irregular or unpredictable bleeding or spotting, an increase or decrease in menstrual bleeding, or no bleeding at all. Unusually heavy or continuous bleeding however, is not a usual effect of DEPO-PROVERA, and if this happens, you should see your health-care provider right away. With continued use of DEPO-PROVERA bleeding usually decreases, and many women stop having periods completely. In clinical studies of DEPO-PROVERA 55% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding (amenorrhea) after 1 year of use, and 68% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding after 2 years of use. The reason that your periods stop is because DEPO-PROVERA causes a resting state in your ovaries. When your ovaries do not release an egg monthly, the regular monthly growth of the lining of your uterus does not occur and, therefore, the bleeding that comes with your normal menstruation does not take place. When you stop using DEPO-PROVERA your menstrual period will usually in time, return to its normal cycle.
2 Bone Mineral Changes
Use of DEPO-PROVERA may be associated with a decrease in the amount of mineral stored in your bones. This could increase your risk of developing bone fractures. The rate of bone mineral loss is greatest in the early years of DEPO-PROVERA use, but after that, it begins to resemble the normal rate of age-related bone mineral loss.
3 Cancer
Studies of women who have used different forms of contraception found that women who used DEPO-PROVERA for contraception had no increased overall risk of developing cancer of the breast, ovary, uterus, cervix, or liver. However, women under 35 years of age whose first exposure to DEPO-PROVERA was within the previous 4 to 5 years may have a slightly increased risk of developing breast cancer similar to that seen with oral contraceptives. You should discuss this with your health-care provider.
4 Unexpected Pregnancy
Because DEPO-PROVERA is such an effective contraceptive method, the risk of accidental pregnancy for women who get their shots regularly (every 3 months [13 weeks]) is very low. While there have been reports of an increased risk of low birth weight and neonatal infant death or other health problems in infants conceived close to the time of injection, such pregnancies are uncommon. If you think you may have become pregnant while using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception, see your health-care provider as soon as possible.
5 Allergic Reactions
Some women using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection have reported severe and potentially life-threatening allergic reactions known as anaphylaxis and anaphylactoid reactions. Symptoms include the sudden onset of hives or swelling and itching of the skin, breathing difficulties, and a drop in blood pressure.
6 Other Risks
Women who use hormone-based contraceptives may have an increased risk of blood clots or stroke. Also, if a contraceptive method fails, there is a possibility that the fertilized egg will begin to develop outside of the uterus (ectopic pregnancy). While these events are rare, you should tell your health-care provider if you have any of the problems listed in the next section.

What symptoms may signal problems while using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
Call your health-care provider immediately if any of these problems occur following an injection of DEPO-PROVERA:

- sharp chest pain, coughing up of blood, or sudden shortness of breath (indicating a possible clot in the lung)
- sudden severe headache or vomiting, dizziness or fainting, problems with your eyesight or speech, weakness, or numbness in an arm or leg (indicating a possible stroke)
- severe pain or swelling in the calf (indicating a possible clot in the leg)
- unusually heavy vaginal bleeding
- severe pain or tenderness in the lower abdominal area
- persistent pain, pus, or bleeding at the injection site

What are the possible side effects of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
1 Weight Gain
You may experience a weight gain while you are using DEPO-PROVERA. About two thirds of the women who used DEPO-PROVERA in clinical trials reported a weight gain of about 5 pounds during the first year of use. You may continue to gain weight after the first year. Women in one large study who used DEPO-PROVERA for 2 years gained an average total of 8.1 pounds over those 2 years, or approximately 4 pounds per year. Women who continued for 4 years gained an average total of 13.8 pounds over those 4 years or approximately 3.5 pounds per year. Women who continued for 6 years gained an average total of 16.5 pounds over those 6 years, or approximately 2.75 pounds per year.
2 Other Side Effects
In a clinical study of over 3,900 women who used DEPO-PROVERA for up to 7 years, some women reported the following effects that may or may not have been related to their use of DEPO-PROVERA: irregular menstrual bleeding, amenorrhea, headache, nervousness, abdominal cramps, dizziness, weakness or fatigue, decreased sexual desire, leg cramps, nausea, vaginal discharge or irritation, breast swelling and tenderness, bloating, swelling of the hands or feet, backache, depression, insomnia, acne, pelvic pain, no hair growth or excessive hair loss, rash, hot flashes, and joint pain. Other problems were reported by very few of the women in the clinical trials, but some of these could be serious. These include convulsions, jaundice, urinary tract infections, allergic reactions, fainting, paralysis, osteoporosis, lack of return to fertility, deep vein thrombosis, pulmonary embolus, breast cancer, or cervical cancer. If these or any other problems occur during your use of DEPO-PROVERA, discuss them with your health-care provider.

Should any precautions be followed during use of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
1 Missed Periods
During the time you are using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception, you may skip a period, or your periods may stop completely. If you have been receiving your DEPO-PROVERA injections regularly every 3 months (13 weeks) then you are probably not pregnant. However, if you think that you may be pregnant, see your health-care provider.
2 Laboratory Test Interactions
If you are scheduled for any laboratory tests, tell your health-care provider that you are using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception. Certain blood tests are affected by hormones such as DEPO-PROVERA.
3 Drug Interactions
Cytadren (aminoglutethimide) is an anticancer drug that may significantly decrease the effectiveness of DEPO-PROVERA if the two drugs are given during the same time.
4 Nursing Mothers
Although DEPO-PROVERA can be passed to the nursing infant in the breast milk, no harmful effects have been found in these children. DEPO-PROVERA does not prevent the breasts from producing milk, so it can be used by nursing mothers. However to minimize the amount of DEPO-PROVERA that is passed to the infant in the first weeks after birth, you should wait until 6 weeks after childbirth before you start using DEPO-PROVERA for contraception.

How often do I get my shot of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
The recommended dose of DEPO-PROVERA is 150 mg every 3 months (13 weeks) given in a single intramuscular injection in the buttock or upper arm. To make sure that you are not pregnant at the time of the first injection, it is essential that the injection be given ONLY during the first 5 days of a normal menstrual period. If used following the delivery of a child, the first injection of DEPO-PROVERA MUST be given within 5 days after childbirth if you are not breast-feeding or 6 weeks after childbirth if you are exclusively breast-feeding. If you wait longer than 3 months (13 weeks) between injections, or longer than 6 weeks after delivery, your health-care provider should determine that you are not pregnant before giving you your injection of DEPO-PROVERA.

Battle bores young fans

Maroon and White freshman Mike Lasme filled the stat sheet with seven points, nine rebounds, three assists, five turnovers, five fouls, one block and 35 minutes in last night's win over the Spiders.

die-hards?

Even the fans that did attend had little spirit to offer in a showcase of the conference's two best defensive teams.

It's nice to feel so personally involved in the game, but it's bad when you know what the cheerleaders are doing after the game and Micah Brand gets the loudest ovation of the night. Even if it was an ovation of boos.

Maybe it's just me, but there are things I'd rather hear during a basketball game than WMUA's squawking play-by-play man and photographers bantering about the size of their lenses.

How about a little atmosphere? Some chants or cheers maybe. Jeez, the intensity in this place rivals Saturday afternoon Bingo.

UMass coach Steve Lappas says "The first step in your program is to own your home court."

Well the rent must be through the roof because nobody's even sniffing the place out.

And it's not like the Athletic Department hasn't tried. They brought Springfield radio personality Sebastian in to sing the national anthem in hopes of causing a stir.

And they hit up every bum-flip of a town in the area for a community night. They even called Saturday's game against Temple "Wear your favorite boy-band t-shirt night."

Seriously.

But if you can't keep a pair of sugar-rushed children interested, what hope does this program have right now?

They should target the younger audience anyway. Because the ring of the final buzzer has barely vacated the arena when our curious youngsters claim the parquet.

They've got the court to themselves now and the arena is almost empty, still.

They're doing their best to force the ball up toward the cylinder. And nothing, not brick nor air ball, can deter these kids.

I guess they really do like basketball.

More about brains than brawn

By JIM LITKE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

People who think it's tough to win a golf tournament without big muscles should remember: winning without brains is even tougher.

That won't be a problem for Annika Sorenstam.

She might need to use more club to cover the same distances as the men she'll face at Colonial in May, but Sorenstam will be every bit their equal when it comes to thinking her way around the course.

In fact, judging by the planning she and her camp have done already, maybe better.

Sorenstam confirmed Wednesday she had accepted one of the dozen sponsor exemptions into the tradition-laden tournament, making sure she mentioned the sponsor's name. And why not? If this is really about the best female golfer in the world measuring her game against men, she couldn't have picked a better spot.

At 7,080 yards, Colonial is among a handful of the shortest courses on the PGA Tour. But the news gets even better. It's covered by Bermuda grass rather than bent, so the ball will run farther down the fairways and the rough will be shorter and less snarly in May, even if it rains.

There are plenty of doglegs, too, which means most of the men will hit irons off a number of the tees. Better still, plenty of the greens are open in front, giving the short hitter a chance to roll approach shots to the flag instead of always having to airmail them.

That explains, in part, why Golf World magazine reported that much of the resistance to Sorenstam playing at Colonial was the fear of some members that the course would become known as "one easy enough for a girl to play." Not that there's much chance of that really happening.

"The real battle for Annika will be getting over the hoopla," Carol Mann said over the phone Tuesday, and she should know. "It's going to be double, maybe triple anything she's ever seen."

Mann, a Hall of Fame golfer, played a disastrous one-on-one match against flamboyant Doug Sanders some 30 years ago. She knows the pressure can be suffocating.

"How will she get into a mind-set to perform? That's a question she can't answer until she experiences it," Mann added. "There was some of that at the end of the 'Battle of Bighorn.' But this will be beyond that."

Sorenstam was paired with Tiger Woods in a made-for-TV match against David Duval and fellow LPGA star Karrie Webb two years ago. The result was bad golf and the worst TV ratings in the three previous years the exhibition matches had been staged.

The reason why, as well as the decision to replace the women last year with seniors Jack Nicklaus and Lee Trevino, became apparent on the 18th tee when neither could reach the 18th fairway with drivers in regulation or the playoff.

Even with the 20 extra yards Sorenstam has added to her tee shots in recent years, she still barely cracks the top 200 in driving distance on the PGA Tour. But that won't be her problem.

Colonial will scrub much of the distance advantage off the men's games, and besides, Sorenstam might be the most accurate player on any tour. She hits three of every four fairways, on average, and four of every five greens.

Still, you have to ask whether this is a good idea. When teaching pro and part-time LPGA member Suzy Whaley qualified for the Greater Hartford Open last fall and later announced she would use the invitation, Sorenstam was part of the chorus pushing for leniency.

"I hope people are educated enough to know she's a teacher," Sorenstam said. "She's not teeing it up on tour out here every week."

But Sorenstam won't get any slack for the very same reason. She's clearly the best the women have to offer, and the hottest golfer on the planet – Woods included. She's won 24 of her 42 career victories since 1999, and last year posted the winningest year for any golfer in four decades.

So it won't matter that she can't drive the ball as far, doesn't have as refined a short game because she hits so many greens on the LPGA Tour or still isn't automatic over 5-foot putts because her usual competition has wilted long before that.

"I'd like to think we've grown up enough to where people would be forgiving, but I think there's going to be a real split, especially if she nusses the cut," Mann said. "Some people will be compassionate and some will be cruel.

"Annika can handle herself, but here's what really scares me," she added. "Because of this, maybe sooner rather than later now, some guys is going to attempt to play on the women's tour."

When someone suggested the embarrassment factor would keep that from happening, Mann said, "I hope you're right. I just wouldn't bet against it."

Maybe she's right. Maybe there are still a few men out there willing to test the theory that brains are still more important in golf than brawn.

Thursday's qualifying races crucial for some

By MIKE HARRIS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) – For some drivers, the twin 125-mile qualifying races are simply a warmup for the Daytona 500. For others, they are their only chance to get into Sunday's race.

"It can be intense," said Ricky Rudd, getting ready to race in his 26th consecutive Daytona 500 and an equal number of qualifying races. "There are a lot of guys here where that race is the only race they're thinking about. They're not even thinking about the Daytona 500."

"If they don't do well in the 125s, they won't have a Daytona 500. Other guys, like us, we're pretty good in points and, with our qualifying speed, the race has a little different meaning to us."

In Daytona's unique qualifying format, Jeff Green and Dale Earnhardt Jr. secured the front row starting spots in the 43-car lineup for the 500-miler by turning in the fastest speeds Monday in time trials.

Positions 3-30 will go to the top 14 finishers in Thursday's Gatorade Twin 125s, excepting Green and Earnhardt.

The 31st through 36th spots will be filled by the fastest drivers from Monday's qualifying session who don't make it in the 125, with the remaining places going to the highest-finishing teams in last year's car-owner points that are not already in the Daytona 500.

Rudd is fifth on the speed chart and thus is guaranteed a starting spot. That's important because the qualifying races can often turn into wild, metal-bending affairs as desperate drivers try to make the move that will get them into the 500. NASCAR's biggest race.

"Our goal is to get through this in one piece with a good starting position for the 500," Rudd said. "I've been fortunate enough to win this race in 2000, but the biggest thing that we want to do is have a car to run in the 500.

"If you go into the 125 and end up three- or four-wide and have the attitude of going out to win the race or knock the wall down, that doesn't make sense for us in our position."

Not so for rookie Greg Biffle, who tried and failed to make the race last year. He was 21st in time trials and has no car-owner points, so his best bet is to race his way in.

"Hopefully, I can position myself to stay up in the top 10 because the racing won't be as frantic up there as the race from about 15th to 17th," said Biffle, last year's Busch Series champion. "That's where they're fighting for the transfer spot.

"I just need to protect my car, because it's the only one I've got," Biffle said.

Kurt Busch, third in points last year, doesn't have to worry, but he knows what it's like to need a good finish in the 125s.

"For me, it's been tremendously nerve-racking just because the past two years, we were so far back in points and we qualified so poorly that we had to be in the top 14," Busch said. "Fortunately, we finished 12th and 11th and barely squeaked by.

"It's a different feeling going into this year's race. We can get some work done in the 125, as far as understanding the draft a bit more."

MEMORANDUM FOR: The President
FROM: Veteran Intelligence Professionals for Sanity (VIPS)
"Secretary Powell's presentation at the UN today requires context. We give him an 'A' for assembling and listing the charges against Iraq, but only a 'C–' in providing context and perspective. His narrow focus on Resolution 1441 has diverted attention from the wider picture.
The key question is whether Iraq's flouting of a UN resolution justifies war. This is the question the world is asking. Secretary Powell's presentation does not come close to answering it."

Former Red Sox G.M. Haywood Sullivan dies

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Associated Press

BOSTON – AP – Former Boston Red Sox co-owner Haywood Sullivan, who helped build three World Series teams, died Wednesday in Fort Myers, Fla.

Sullivan, who lived in Naples, Fla., died after suffering a stroke, said spokesman Kevin Shea said. Sullivan was 72.

Sullivan was brought to Lee Memorial Hospital in Fort Myers at 7:04 p.m., hospital spokeswoman said.

Sullivan had an instrumental and puzzling four-year run as one of baseball's most memorable owners in the history of the franchise, Red Sox president Larry Lucchino said in a statement.

"Haywood was both liked and genuinely respected throughout the baseball community," he said. "I know we will miss Haywood's many, many friends in mourning the loss of a great and noble man."

Sullivan, the only man who was a Red Sox player, general manager and owner, joined Tom Yawkey to become a partner in the team in 1978 and was general manager from 1978 to 1983. Although he presided over one of the team's seasons – the '78 pennant race that ended with Yankees shortstop Bucky Dent's popup cleared the Green Monster for a one-game playoff – he was better known as having a great deal of ball fun.

Sullivan stayed on purpose some say, to mail a contract to Jim Rice before the deadline in 1980, allowing him to receive a big agent. The All-Star catcher signed with the Detroit White Sox and played another 13 years of a Hall of Fame career.

Sullivan was also a witness to the attempted coup d'etat engineered by fellow owner Buddy LeRoux, who was angered on Jerry Creighton Night in 1985 that he had not been told of the team's sale. Sullivan and Yawkey LeRoux's time left was by his to fire Sullivan and replace him with Dick O'Connell, a move that landed them in court. Sullivan finished the season as GM, when he was replaced by Lou Gorman.

Sullivan remained in the team's front office as chief executive officer and chief operating officer. The Jean R. Yawkey Trust bought out Sullivan's share of the club in 1995.

"Personally, I have only the greatest respect and fondness for Haywood," former team chief executive John Harrington said. "We worked closely together for so many years and he became a dear friend. Haywood was always one of Tom and Jean Yawkey's favorites and I truly believe that they are having a great reunion right now.

Born Dec. 15, 1930 in Donalsonville, Ga., Sullivan was a two-sport athlete at the University of Florida, where he played football and baseball. The Red Sox signed him in 1952.

Sullivan had a brief major league career, catching for the Red Sox and the Kansas City Athletics. He managed the A's most of the 1965 season to a last-place finish, after which he joined the Red Sox front office.

He finished with a .226 batting average in 312 games, hitting 15 homers and 87 RBIs. He was 34-82 as a manager.

His son, Marc, also was a catcher from 1982 to 1987. Former Red Sox pitcher Bill Lee, who was traded by Sullivan to Montreal in 1979, had just seen him in Fort Myers, at a fantasy baseball camp run by Marc Sullivan.

"I had patched up most of my differences with him," Lee said Wednesday from his Craftsbury, Vt., home. "We kind of shook hands through the fence – he was as big as ever. He was in fine shape."

"He was very good to me," said former Red Sox manager Ralph Houk, reached at his home in Winter Haven, Fla.

"He was great man am way you look at it. The only thing he wanted was to win," said Houk, who managed the Red Sox from 1981 to 1984.

Spikes not confident about Bengals' future

CINCINNATI (AP) – Linebacker Takeo Spikes isn't convinced the Cincinnati Bengals are poised to start winning.

He wanted the NFL's worst team to let him leave as a free agent, but might not get his wish. By using their transition tag, the Bengals gave themselves the leverage to keep him for another season.

NEW YORK (AP) – The NFL's American Bowl between the Super Bowl champion Tampa Bay Buccaneers and the New York Jets will be played in Tokyo on Aug. 2.

BASKETBALL

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) – Teresa Phillips' first game as coach of Tennessee State's men's basketball team will be one for the record books.

Phillips, the school's athletic director, will become the first woman to coach a men's Division I college basketball team when the Tigers play at Austin Peay in Clarksville, Tenn., on Thursday night. Phillips suspended interim coach Hosea Lewis for one game, and announced she would coach.

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) – The Golden State Warriors settled a legal dispute with their landlord by paying a $22 million arbitration judgment.

The settlement ends a dispute between the Warriors and the Oakland Alameda County Joint Powers Authority, which claimed the Warriors failed to make payments on premium seating revenue, rent and facility fees during its first two seasons in the refurbished arena.

NEW YORK (AP) – Kareem Abdul-Jabbar will join CBS Sports as an analyst during its coverage of the NCAA tournament.

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) – Fort Worth Dunbar coach Robert Hughes became the nation's winningest high school basketball coach with his 1,275th victory.

Playing its final regular-season game, Dunbar beat Fort Worth Polytechnic 71-62 to break a tie between Hughes and Morgan Wootten, who retired as the coach at DeMatha High in Hyattsville, Md., last November at age 71.

AUTO RACING

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. – A five-car crash during practice for the Daytona 500 sent the crews of Mike Skinner, Jeff Burton and Elliott Sadler scrambling for backup cars to use in Thursday's twin 125-mile qualifying races.

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) – NASCAR's inaugural preseason poll voted Jeff Gordon as the No. 1 contender for the Winston Cup championship.

HOCKEY

TORONTO (AP) – Steve Stavro sold his controlling share in the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Toronto Raptors and the Air Canada Centre after running the hockey team for a decade and buying the basketball team and arena four years ago.

Bell Globemedia, owned by BCE Inc. and the family of billionaire Kenneth Thomson, bought part of Stavro's stake in the company that owns the NHL and NBA teams and the arena.

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) – Goaltender Arturs Irbe cleared waivers, meaning one of the stars of the Carolina Hurricanes' surprising run to the 2002 Stanley Cup finals will be sent to the minors.

HORSE RACING

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) – Sentencing has been postponed for the "inside man" in the betting scandal that nearly resulted in a $3 million payout on a rigged bet at the Breeders' Cup.

Chris Harn of Newark, Del., will instead be sentenced March 11. That's also sentencing day for Harn's fraternity brothers and partners in crime, Derrick Davis of Baltimore and Glen DaSilva of New York.

PITTSBURGH (AP) – Traces of the painkiller OxyContin were found in the blood of five racehorses in what one official said was a rare case involving the drug.

The state Harness Racing Commission said it is investigating an undisclosed number of trainers at The Meadows, a harness track about 20 miles south of Pittsburgh.

TENNIS

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) – Andre Agassi used the same form he demonstrated in easily winning the Australian Open, defeating Michael Chang 6-4, 6-2 in the Siebel Open first round.

ANTWERP, Belgium (AP) – Kim Clijsters beat Myriam Casanova 6-3, 6-2 but sister Elke Clijsters failed to make it a family double before a home crowd, losing to Patty Schnyder 6-2, 6-3 at the Diamond Games.

BASEBALL

TAMPA, Fla. (AP) – Florida left-hander Mark Redman became the first player to win in salary arbitration this year, getting a raise from $500,000 to $2.15 million instead of the $1.8 million the Marlins had wanted.

Owners have a 2-1 lead in cases decided thus far, with 11 players still scheduled for hearings through Feb. 20.

SOCCER

CARY, N.C. (AP) – Jay Entlich, a U.S. women's national team assistant coach, was hired as head coach of the WUSA champion Carolina Courage.

Sorenstam accepts invitation to play Colonial

By STEPHEN HAWKINS
Associated Press

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) – Annika Sorenstam wondered how she would stack up against stronger players on tougher courses under the most suffocating scrutiny.

So she's going to play against men.

The world's best female golfer accepted an invitation Wednesday to play in the Colonial in May, which would make her the first woman in 58 years to compete on the PGA Tour.

"For all the well-wishers who want to know why I would accept such a challenge, the answer is simple: I am curious to see if I can compete in a PGA Tour event," Sorenstam said.

No one has been able to touch her on the LPGA Tour lately.

She won 13 times around the world last year, shattered the tour's scoring record and finished out of the top 10 only three times. The year before, she became the first woman to shoot 59 and earn more than $2 million in one season.

"I just think she wants to find out how good she really is, and if the gap between women's golf and men's golf is that great – or not great at all," Tiger Woods said.

Other players are equally interested in how she will fare against the best in golf at an event steeped in tradition and made famous by Ben Hogan.

"Annika's accomplishments show that she is certainly deserving," Tournament chairman Dee Finley said.

He said no Colonial members voiced objections to Sorenstam's participation in the event.

"I don't see how anybody could say having the finest woman golfer would have a negative impact on the club," he said.

Sorenstam picked the perfect course – one that does not require as much power off the tee. Colonial is 7,080 yards (par 70) and puts a premium on accuracy, Sorenstam's forte.

She averages 265 yards off the tee, which would rank close to 200th in driving distance on the PGA Tour. She might have to hit long irons or a 7-wood into some of the greens to pins tucked behind deep bunkers.

History is hardly on her side.

The last woman to play on the PGA Tour was Babe Zaharias, one of the greatest all-around female athletes ever. She qualified for the 1945 Los Angeles Open and made the 36-hole cut before she was eliminated in the third round with a 79.

"I'm as curious as anybody to see how the best LPGA player of today, and possibly all time, will play against the men," Phil Mickelson said.

Mickelson, a past champion at Colonial, predicted Sorenstam would "definitely" make the cut and probably finish 20th.

Asked how he would do, Mickelson said, "I hope 19th or better."

Woods did not want to guess how Sorenstam would do, saying it will depend on the weather and how the course is set up.

Dry conditions would allow the ball to roll more, allowing her to hit the ball farther. If it's windy or wet, the course would play even longer.

"She might have to have more of a conservative game plan and just dump the ball in the middle of the green," he said.

Woods is unlikely to play in the Colonial, although he predicted a media frenzy unlike anything Sorenstam has ever seen. He also said her participation could be risky.

"I think it's great she's playing, but ... it will only be great for women's golf if she plays well," Woods said. "If she puts up two high scores, it will be more detrimental than good."

Still, it gives the issue of women in golf even more attention.

Martha Burk and the National Council of Women's Organizations have made headlines for urging Augusta National to allow a female member before the Masters in April.

The 32-year-old Sorenstam, who is getting one of the 12 sponsor exemptions for the Colonial, will be the first of three women to play against the men this year.

Connecticut club pro Suzy Whaley plans to play in the Greater Hartford Open in July. She qualified by winning a PGA of America sectional tournament, even though she was allowed to hit from a shorter set of tees. (Sorenstam will play from the same tees as the men.)

Minutemen squash Spiders

Hold off late rally for third A-10 win

The Massachusetts men's basketball team lost these games earlier in the season.

UMass (9-14, 3-7 Atlantic 10) blew a 36-16 lead early in the second half as Richmond (12-9, 6-4 A-10) used a 27-7 run to even the score at 43 apiece with 8:33 left. This wasn't new territory for the Minutemen, who gave up good sized leads to Central Connecticut State and UConn.

UMass	54	second
Richmond	53	half as

The difference this time – the Maroon and White fought back and pulled out the 54-53 victory over the Spiders.

Anthony Anderson broke the 43-43 tie with a fall-down 3-pointer at the top of the key.

"I was open coming off the screen, so I was shooting," said Anderson, who led all scorers with 16 points.

The basket, which came with 7:27 remaining, was the final field goal made by the Minutemen, who shot 8-for-15 from the charity stripe the rest of the way.

Richmond was never able to cut the lead back within three despite a stellar defensive performance from junior guard Tony Dobbins.

The Mitchellville, Md. native notched three steals down the stretch to keep the Spiders within reach. He finished with eight steals on the night, the second most ever in an A-10 game.

"He's very disruptive," UMass coach Steve Lappas said. "We knew that going in.

"He's the 1A 10 Defensive Player of the Year," the second-year coach predicted.

UMass extended a 25-14 halftime lead into a 20-point lead in just over three minutes.

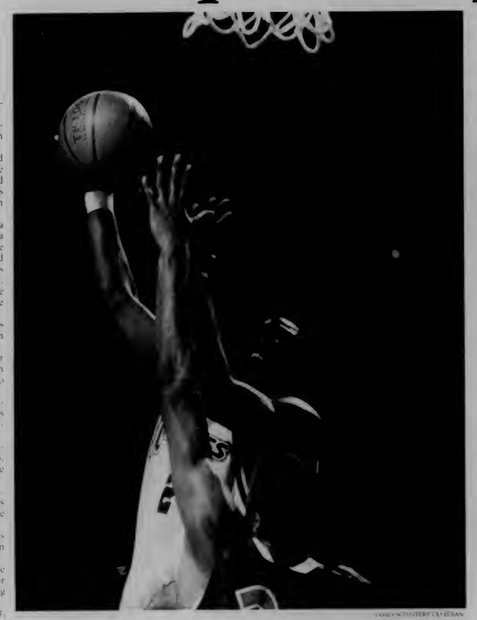
Freshman Jeff Viggiano and Anderson drilled 3s on the team's first two possessions and Jackie Rogers added five points to open the final frame with an 11-2 run.

Richmond clawed back into a tie eight minutes later behind a combination of UMass' offensive futility – the Minutemen scored just five points in 6:46 – and its own offense finally coming alive. Guard Jeff Myers got hot on the run, scoring 12 points in the eight-minute span.

Myers finished with 15 points on 4-for-14 shooting (3-for-10 on 3-pointers).

Dobbins matched Myers for the team-high, scoring his 15 on 5-for-11 shooting. Dobbins also grabbed 14 rebounds.

As a team, Richmond struggled from the floor. The Spiders managed to convert on just 18-for-66 in the contest.



Forward Mike Skrocki struggled the most for Richmond. No. 22 shot just 1-for-17 from the field.

Behind Anderson's performance, only senior Jackie Rogers reached double-digits for the Minutemen last night.

Rogers also equaled his career-high with 11 rebounds in the contest.

UMass freshman Alassane Kouyate was in street clothes for the contest after spending Monday night in the hospital.

Lappas expects the 6-foot-8 Bamako, Mali native to play in Saturday's contest at St. Bonaventure.

Jackie Rogers tied a career-high with 11 rebounds to go along with 11 points in UMass' 54-53 win over Richmond last night at the Mullins Center.

Defensive game bores young fans

Matthew F. Sacco

In true pre-adolescent fashion, two youngsters are turning a collection of 15 hockey pucks into a jolly good time. They're using the solid rubber discs to make pyramids, towers, sculptures and various other edifices. It's a competition, with each brown-haired, baby-faced shorty trying to one-up the other.

The pair continue in this manner for a good 20 minutes, unfazed by the large collection of brass instruments blazing pop music behind them, and completely oblivious to the college basketball game being played just a couple hup-scotches from their perch.

It takes only 15 minutes of game time for the kids to completely lose interest. Apparently, the wheeled loading platform-turned-skateboard in the back hall of the Mullins Center is a lot more captivating.

What's the matter, don't these kids like college hoops?

"Yeah we do," the brave one mutters as he fiddles with the bangs over his brow. "This game's boring."

That's minus-two from the second lowest crowd in the history of the Mullins Center. Only 2,582 showed for the Atlantic 10 game between Massachusetts and Richmond.

Apparently, Agawam Community Night couldn't bring in the masses. Still, you'd think a team like the Minutemen – with so much young talent and three freshman starters – would at least draw its share of interest.

We're not talking about a sellout here people. But it'd be nice to see the fans outnumber the empty maroon seats.

Somehow, in the seven years since UMass' only Final Four, the arena that used to make enemies feel claustrophobic couldn't make Fat Albert feel uncomfortable if he was sitting in the front row of the student section.

I guess it's understandable. An 8-14 team playing a perennial NIT entrant is hardly a big draw.

So here's a toast to the die-hards. Wait, what

Bulger speaks on budget

President Bulger addresses the Faculty Senate on the economic crisis facing the university. He praised Chancellor John Lombardi for the money he has already helped to raise since since his tenure began in July 2002.

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger addressed the Faculty Senate concerning budget issues and the future of the University.

"You've been sailing against the wind of a stubborn economic crisis, and have made great headway," Bulger said. "The community is indeed grateful."

Bulger explained that the current economic situation is not isolated to Massachusetts, but is happening across the nation. He praised Chancellor John Lombardi for the money he has already helped to raise since his tenure began in July 2002.

"You've managed to raise 60 percent of the campus goal – in just this half of the year," he said. He credited Lombardi with convincing donors that the University was a valuable and important investment.

Specifically, Bulger said that it was Lombardi's explanation of how his donation could be used that convinced FleetBoston's Terrence Murray to make his $2 million donation. Bulger called the donations of Murray and more recently of the Mahoney family, "tangible statements of faith in you."

Bulger praised the faculty and campus for "continuing to achieve excellence despite fiscal hardships," and said he was "disappointed that there was no money for pay raises."

Bulger emphasized he and the Board of Trustees is working with the Massachusetts business community to encourage them to "get in on the competitive University research race by joining with UMass." He named EMC and General Electric as two major corporations interested in the University for donations. Additionally, Bulger has asked new governor Mitt Romney for $5 million as a bid to compete to be the home of a new national engineering and research center.

Following his address, Bulger took time to answer questions from the floor of the Faculty Senate.

Ron Story, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) commented before the body that he and the union appreciated the efforts of the president.

Bulger replied by saying that he appreciated the MSP's efforts and situation.

"Be assured of this; we're very much in sync on this. We advocated

Campus could be smoke free

By S.J. PORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate voted to approve the University Health Council's motion to designate the campus as a "Tobacco-Free Campus." The administration has twenty days to reject the motion before the University will undergo changes to make it a tobacco-free campus.

The motion came from the University Health Council to revise the current "Smoke-Free policy" (in effect since 1993) to "assist in the prevention of tobacco-related morbidity and mortality, and to promote civic and individual wellness on our campus."

The changes that will be incurred, unless the administration challenges the decision, include the closure of the remaining smoking lounges in ten dormitories on campus.

The present UMass policy allows for smoking in residence halls designated as "smoking lounges." However, according to the Health Council, despite this attempt to limit smoking and second hand smoke they receive numerous complaints from students concerning the smoke each year. Additionally, the students with asthma and allergies, the Health Council says, are often forced to move to other areas due to the smoke exposure. With the new policies all smoking lounges on campus will be closed.

Smoking will be prohibited in residence halls as soon as possible according to the Health Council's motion, however changes must be put into place by September of 2004 at the latest. Before then, smoking will be prohibited in campus building and in areas of campus where "non-smokers cannot avoid exposure to smoke... including partially enclosed areas such as covered walkways, breezeways and walkways between sections of buildings, and bus-stop shelters, as well as all areas immediately adjacent to building entrances and the exteriors of staircases and landings.

Included in the motion is the prohi-

U.S. will discuss weapons

By GEORGE GEDDA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Secretary of State Colin Powell told Congress Thursday that North Korea had turned down a proposal by the Bush administration to involve China and other nations in talks with the United States over North Korea's nuclear weapons programs.

AHN YOUNG-JOON/ASSOCIATED PRESS

A South Korean soldier stands under the national flag at a border observation post near the demilitarized zone (DMZ) in Paju, Korea on Thursday.

Powell said the United States had told Pyongyang that Asian neighbors have a stake in putting the "nuclear genie back in the bottle," and corking it.

"We have here a regional situation," Powell said. "It can't be just the United States," trying to reduce the threat from North Korean weapons development.

In reply, North Korea insisted on direct talks with the United States alone, Powell told the House Budget Committee.

Also Thursday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said North Korea may pose a bigger threat as a supplier of nuclear weapons than it would as a potential aggressor in Asia.

"They sell almost everything," Rumsfeld told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "They are the world's greatest proliferator of missile technology," and hence a problem for more than one nation to solve, he said.

At the United Nations, the United States said Thursday that U.N. sanctions to punish North Korea for its nuclear program are not an option for now. U.S. Deputy Ambassador Richard Williamson said the Bush administration wants to pursue a diplomatic solution.

The United States and North Korea agreed in 1994 to freeze North Korea's plutonium program in exchange for energy supplies. It turned out North Korea went ahead with a separate program to develop enriched uranium, Powell noted Thursday.

Since then, North Korea has confirmed having an active nuclear program and said it would quit an international treaty designed to limit the spread of nuclear weapons technology.

Rep. Dennis Moore, D-Kan., questioned the administration approach, and said the United States should begin negotiations with North Korea directly. Asian neighbors could be brought in later, Moore said.

White House spokeswoman Claire Buchan, speaking earlier Thursday, reiterated that Bush will not negotiate alone.

"Our position remains the same, that this is a multilateral issue that needs to be" handled by multiple nations, she said.

On Wednesday, the Bush administration said it is concerned that its goal of a denuclearized North Korea may not be possible unless China uses diplomatic leverage to force a retreat by Pyongyang.

China accounts for 80 percent of the foreign assistance North Korea receives, Powell said then.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Yingfan said Wednesday: "We have to handle this. That's our responsibility. But how to, and when, I think we need some consultation" among members of the U.N. Security Council.

Since North Korea's uranium-based nuclear program was first disclosed last October, China has made clear that it opposes the existence of nuclear weapons on the peninsula.

U.S. intelligence officials, meanwhile, said Wednesday that Pyongyang has an untested ballistic missile capable of hitting the western United States and possibly targets farther inland.

The North Korean weapon is a three-stage version of its Taepo Dong 2 missile, Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told reporters. CIA Director George Tenet, who joined Jacoby before the Senate Armed Services Committee, acknowledged that North Korea has a missile that can at least reach the West Coast.

However, U.S. intelligence officials said later North Korea has demonstrated no new missile capabilities in the last year. The officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the statements were based on the same information that led U.S. intelligence to conclude a few years ago that North Korea was close to being able to flight-test a three-stage Taepo Dong 2.

Without flight-testing, the reliability of such a missile is questionable. For several years, North Korea has held to a voluntary moratorium on flight tests of its long-range missiles, although American officials say Pyongyang may renew them at any time.

Lawsuit filed against Bush

By DENISE LAVOIE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Six House members, members of the military and parents of servicemen went to federal court Thursday to try to prevent the president from launching an invasion of Iraq without an explicit declaration of war from Congress.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., and the other plaintiffs said the October 2002 congressional resolution backing military action against Iraq did not specifically declare war and unlawfully ceded the decision to President Bush.

Conyers cited the passage from the U.S. Constitution that states, "Congress shall have power ... to declare war."

"Get it? Only Congress," Conyers said at a news conference in Washington.

John Bonifaz, the Boston lawyer who filed the lawsuit seeking an immediate injunction, said Bush is rushing to war without seeking approval or even a thorough debate by Congress.

"The president is not a king," he said. "He does not have the power to wage war against another country absent a declaration of war from Congress."

U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro agreed late Thursday to hold an expedited hearing Feb. 20 on the injunction request.

The other members of Congress named as plaintiffs are: Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio; Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill.; Jim McDermott, D-Wash.; Jose Serrano, D-N.Y.; and Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas.

Other plaintiffs include a member of the Massachusetts National Guard who was recently activated, an Air Force reservist from Massachusetts, and a Marine stationed in the Persian Gulf, Bonifaz said. Their identities were not released.

"I would imagine that they're aware the lawsuit is a very long shot, an extremely long shot," said Taylor Reveley, dean of the William and Mary School of Law and author of the book "War Powers of the President and Congress: Who Holds the Arrows and Olive Branch?"

"But they're probably interested in doing anything they can to throw sand in the wheels of American military action in Iraq."

Reveley said majorities in both houses of Congress approving a resolution authorizing military action – as the House and Senate did in October – would pass constitutional muster and provide wide presidential discretion.

The congressional resolution states: "This joint resolution may be cited as the 'Authorization for the Use of Military Force Against Iraq.'"

Congress has not formally declared a war since World War II. The War Powers Act, passed in 1973 in response to the Vietnam War and the actions of

Tennis finds positives in rough weekend at Yale

By ANNA EDWARDS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

NEW HAVEN, Conn. – The Massachusetts women's tennis team began its spring schedule on Tuesday with a 7-0 defeat at the hands of Yale. The non-conference loss put UMass at 1-2 overall and 0-1 for the spring season so far.

Freshman Dorothy Iwanowicz had the closest match of the day for the Minutewomen, against Yale's Karlyn Martin. Iwanowicz dropped the first set 6-3 but recovered to take the second set 6-4. Martin proved dominant in the final set and sealed the match with a 6-1 victory.

"I played well and it boosted my confidence," said Iwanowicz. "We played well and think it is a good start to the season."

This was the first competitive match for the Minutewomen since Oct. 2 due to subsequent games being rained out.

"The team was happy with the start and the scores don't reflex how well we played," Iwanowicz said.

Sophomore Sasha Edelstein, who held a 5-1 singles record for fall 2002, was satisfied with her performance against Yale's Margaret Purcell despite being defeated 6-3, 6-2.

"I gave a good fight, did my best and played well," Edelstein said.

There is no doubt that Yale is a tough opponent. It entered the spring season with confidence after ending its fall schedule by clinching the 2002 ECAC Team Championships, 5-2, against Princeton. This, combined with the Minutewomen's lack of competitive play, meant the Bulldogs had a psychological advantage over the Maroon and White.

Edelstein partnered Iwanowicz in their doubles match against Yale's Buffy Kaufman and Stephanie White, and were defeated 8-4.

"At 4-4 it was really close and we felt the game was good," Edelstein said.

The team will be focusing on improving its doubles skills after focusing on its singles game at the beginning of the season.

The Minutewomen went into the meet with Yale hoping to win one of their matches.

"[Yale] was good practice and gave us an idea what to work on," junior captain Susan Hyams said.

Hyams added that each player has an individual technique that she will have to work on. The next 10 days training will give them the opportunity to work on these.

Hyams highlighted the importance of aggression for individual players and as something that she is working on personally.

"Some players are passive and some are aggressive and aggression is important," said Hyams.

Said Edelstein, "I will be practicing on my backhand and being aggressive."

Both Hyams and Edelstein agreed that the team's next match against Army is one that the Minutewomen can enter into confidently.

"We have a good feeling with Army. It is a match that can go either way," said Hyams.

The Maroon and White will be pushing Army for an early season victory when they meet at home on Feb. 21.

Tough road test for UMass

Heads to D.C. for date with Colonials

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It probably isn't the best way to heal the sting of a 56-50 loss to one of the supposedly weaker teams in its division, but the Massachusetts women's basketball team will venture down to Washington, D.C. tonight for a matchup with George Washington at 7 p.m.

The Colonials, best in the Atlantic 10 with a 9-1 conference record (15-6 overall), come into the game off an epic 94-92 loss to Xavier on Sunday, Feb. 9. It was GW's first conference loss of the year.

The game went to four overtimes before Xavier's Amy Waugh sank two free throws to give the Musketeers the 94-90 advantage. The Colonials made one more basket before time expired, but came away with the loss.

As for the Minutewomen (12-9, 4-6 A-10), they travel to the Charles E. Smith Center on the heels of the loss to St. Bonaventure – their fourth loss in five games. Clearly hampered by the loss of sophomore point guard Katie Nelson, the Minutewomen have struggled from the field, compiling a .393 shooting percentage in their last five contests.

But the team has repeated its mantra of focusing on the present, as taught by a sports psychologist recently. Of course, a look back never hurts either.

"We can't get that game back," senior Nekole Smith said of the loss to St. Bonaventure, "so there's no point in us really focusing on it too much anymore. We are about to take on the leaders in the conference. And we're really reflecting on last year, when we beat them and they were undefeated."

It was Feb. 24, 2002. Coming into the last game of the regular season, the Colonials were indeed without a loss, and took on the Minutewomen at the Mullins Center on Senior Day. After a 17-6 run in the second half, UMass took the game, 62-53, to send it into the playoffs riding high. Of course, that was last year, and this season, the Minutewomen are a different team.

"We're better this year than we were last year," Smith said. "Definitely record-wise, but mentally, it's just going to be a test of how much we overcome; will we hang our heads or will we hold our heads high?"

Not to mention the fact that senior Jennifer Butler, who scored her 19th double-double of the season on that day in late February, has the chance to grab her 18th double-double of the season

Lawsuit against Bush

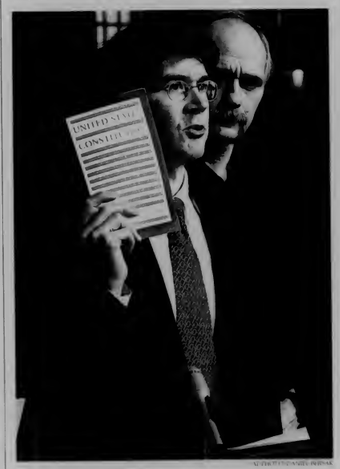
President Nixon, requires the president to seek congressional approval before or shortly after ordering military action abroad. It also requires the president to report to Congress.

A similar lawsuit filed against Bush's father before the Gulf War by 54 members of Congress was rejected by a federal judge in 1990.



That judge said he agreed in principle that the president must seek congressional authorization for war, but said the elder President Bush had not clearly committed the country to a course of action. The judge also noted that only about 10 percent of the Congress had asked for the injunction – a percentage he said was not representative of the entire body.

Bonifaz said the new lawsuit is different because in addition to the six members of Congress, members of the military have asked for the injunction. "They are facing the possibility of death," he said.

One plaintiff, Nancy Lessin, said she has 25-year-old twin stepsons, one of them a Marine.

"We'd like to challenge George Bush to send one of his twins to war. Then let's have a discussion about whether or not we should go to war," she said.

Bonifaz said similar lawsuits filed by soldiers during the Vietnam War were unsuccessful. But he said those lawsuits failed because the courts found Congress had taken concrete steps to authorize a war, including appropriating money and authorizing the draft.

Boston attorney John Bonifaz, left, holds a copy of the U.S. Constitution during a news conference Thursday in Boston.

for the contracts," he said. "At times like this there is, however, pessimism about how long it takes to right the economy – especially with threats from overseas."

Several Senators asked the president if he thought the University was even on the new governor's "radar," and if so, what he has planned.

Bulger replied by saying that he does not have the standing with Romney yet that he did with past governors like William Weld. He impressed upon the Senate that he felt the new governor had stiff issues ahead of him to tackle.

"He put his name on the ballot. I respect that. But there's a whole new world of reality after the campaign, and he's facing that now," he said. "The wrong course for him [Romney] is to do nothing right now. He should give a signal."

Concerns arose about the library and whether its funding would be cut further this year to which Bulger assured the faculty he would do his best to "get the money to do it," saying he would "renew the effort."

"The library is of the most importance," he said. "As far as I'm concerned it's the best bang for the buck. It's a resource that deserves to be funded well. I will talk with the Chancellor to see just what I can do."

Questioning tobacco

bition of sale and distribution of any and all tobacco products on campus. Campus organization will additionally be prohibited from "accepting money or gifts from tobacco companies." And tobacco advertisements will be prohibited in University as well as student run publications.

The University Health Council says that it will strengthen the accessibility to tobacco treatment on campus for students, faculty and staff to assist with adjustment. By working with the American Cancer Society towards the goals designed by the "Smoke-Free New England Campus Initiative," doors will open for the University and University Health Services to receive grants and resources aimed at reducing tobacco use in general.

Senators questioned the University's ability to enforce the new policies without added security on campus.

Jo-Anne Vanin, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, responded to the questions of enforcement and how the policies would affect students by saying, "It will be a challenge, but one we are willing to take on. We're moving in the right direction."

Factors that led to the Health Council's motion include statistics showing that 28 percent of college students smoke, but that students who enter as non-smokers are 40 percent less likely to begin smoking if they live in smoke-free residence halls than students living in unrestricted housing.

"There has been a dramatic increase over the past decade in the numbers of college-age smokers," the Council's report states.

The University as owners of residential property have the right to regulate treatment of and happening on that space, according to the Health Council.

The Health Council considers the decision "essential" to assist the "University in providing bold leadership in the continued effort to ensure a safe living, learning, and working environment, free from the hazards of tobacco, for the members of the University community."

WASHINGTON – Police carrying semiautomatic rifles patrolled the grounds of the Capitol on Thursday, and the government warned key industries and utilities to beware of employees who might have been planted by al-Qaida or other terrorist groups.

The security measures were the latest to emerge since the nation went on high alert for possible terrorist attacks last week. The orange level is the second-highest in a five-point, color-coded scale that would be topped only by a red alert that meant an attack was imminent or under way.

There are no plans to raise the threat level, Justice Department officials said. U.S. counterterrorism officials said they are continuing to gather intelligence but have no specific information as to targets or methods for a terrorist strike.

Authorities have said they are worried about attacks timed to coincide with the hajj, a Muslim holy period that ended Thursday, or the beginning of a war with Iraq.

Tension in the capital has risen, underscored by the officers carrying rifles in the Capitol complex and the deployment of antiaircraft missile batteries around the city.

The FBI and the National Infrastructure Protection Center issued a bulletin Wednesday to companies involved in such industries as telecommunications, energy, banking and finance, as well as operators of water systems and electric utilities, law enforcement agencies and emergency services.

Officials believe al-Qaida could target these entities with chemical, biological or radiological attacks. Such an attack, officials say, could prompt terror and mass casualties and also disrupt the regional or national economy.

Of particular concern is the "dirty bomb," a crude, easy-to-make device that would spew radioactive material over a wide area.

Industry officials should check out their employees in an effort to root out any terrorists who may have been working there for years, waiting for the signal to strike. Al-Qaida's mode of operation is patience, sometimes taking years to plan an attack – as it did for those that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001.

Terrorism at home? Keep a level head

It has been a week now since the government put the nation on high alert for a terrorist attack. That's orange for those who are color conscious. People in many cities have been driven by their greatest fears of attack since the war on terror began a year and a half ago. Eighty two percent of Americans think that an imminent terrorist attack is at least somewhat likely, if not very likely.

This is of course serious business as we live in dangerous times. However, I suppose that things have gone a bit overboard. panic due to people thinking the worst, but much more due to the media and our own government taking things to the extreme.

With the world we live in, people should of course be wary of strange packages they receive in the mail. If they are observant of suspicious activity for which they have either hard concrete evidence, or something pretty close to that, then they should report such info to the proper authorities.

Yet if you have a neighbor who you never talk and now think that because they keep the shades down all day, that they are probably planning the next attack on the United States, please take a step back and reevaluate.

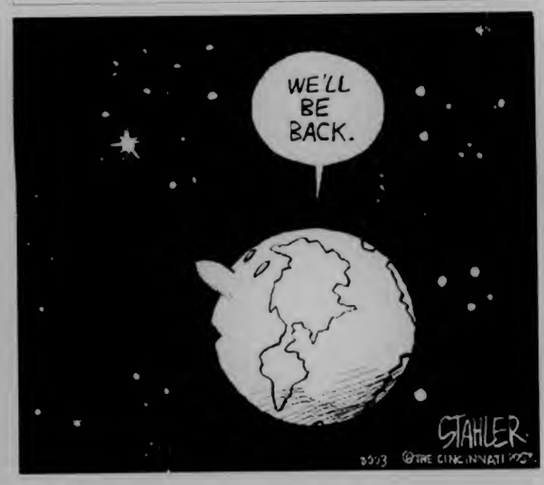
Osama Bin Laden released several messages this week warning of future strikes against our country. In the past, attacks linked to al Qaeda have been preceded by such messages, so the government has stepped up security.

Anti-cruise missiles and aircraft are in place, policing New York City, Washington, D.C., and other high-risk targets. This past week, Logan Airport experienced a frenzy when a suspicious package was found. The same commotion temporarily shut down the Whitestone Bridge in the Big Apple and the 14th Street Bridge in our nation's capital.

These are legitimate threats and cause for moderate alarm. The police in each respective area went in to investigate and quickly determined nothing was wrong. That's the right way to do things.

Some people understand the need to maintain a sense of normalcy in their lives. Former New York City mayor Ed Koch stated it best declaring, "We've been through too much to be frightened."

There are others though taking every warning the government issues to the utmost extreme. With our leaders proclaiming that the next attack may include the use of a "dirty bomb," which releases radiation over a wide ranging area, officials have instructed people to stock up on duct tape and plastic wrap to seal their house from a biological and/or chemical threat.



Our government means well in advising officials to have supplies, but do we really think that some gray tape and flimsy plastic sheeting is going to hermetically seal our homes. This move seems similar to children in the 60s doing the "duck and cover" incase of a nuclear bomb strike; it is almost laughable.

Let's remember to stop and think that although our nation could face an attack in the near future, it could also be under siege at any time of any day of the year. The FBI had suspicions of previous attacks, but it is doubtful anyone had specific evidence that September 11, 2001 was going to turn out to be the day it was. So instead of rushing down to Aubuchon's for some house sealing supplies, let's all take a step back and be alert to the world around us, without losing our heads.

Whether you like it or not

It is only on rare occasions that the leaders of supposedly democratic nations blatantly mislead action that flies in the face of their constituents's opinions. Usually that type of leader is a lunatic or a very ordinary sort. Sometimes they are unintelligent and fail to realize what that type of apathy toward public opinion can mean for a political career. Other times the leader is an autocrat who, though elected democratically, cares little for democracy and the people he or she is supposed to represent. I hesitate to think about which one we have.

In all of my years, I have never seen an administration in any country bring what could so easily be manufactured. Give me some surveillance pictures of Iraq. 10 minutes with Photoshop 8.0, and I will give you more evidence that Saddam is a threat to the U.S. than Colin Powell could show at the U.N. I would include pictures of Saddam lying naked across biological weapons of terror. It could even throw in a picture of Brittany Spears showcasing vats of anthrax. Why are they using graduate student papers to prove to us that this is a good idea? We know it's not a good idea, and sweeping majority of America still doesn't care.

Besides, is it really that difficult to lie to the American people? We believe people went to the moon, we believe that the FBI had nothing to do with the shootings of JFK, Malcolm X and King; we believe that global warming isn't a threat, and we sadly believe Bush is doing a good job (check the approval ratings). We will believe pretty much anything if it means we don't have to get off our couches and miss "Joe Millionaire."

Eric Hedges

Now people are up in arms because the U.N. has once again withdrawn its support and China and Russia will be calls mad at us if we invade. Now, I'm not from Texas, but who cares? When is the last time China and Russia had the best interest of the U.S. in mind? Saddam could drop 10 million bombs on the U.S., and they would sit back and laugh. And when is the last time the U.N. supported anything the U.S. did? And when is the last time they did something about it? Exactly. Screw the global community, none of them give a damn about people in the countries we bomb. It's all politics. Tell those clowns to mind their own struggling GNP. This is between Iraq and us.

"We will believe pretty much anything if it means we don't have to get off our couches and miss 'Joe Millionaire.'"

Other countries are mad because they want Iraqi oil too, and we are going to get it. So, in a sense, we could think of the invasion of Iraq as investment. We get to assert our dominance, get lots of oil, and, as a bonus, as much Iraqi fashion as we can grab. All this and more, at the low, low price of a few hundred billion dollars. We can call it 'Crazy George's Imperialist Extravaganza!' The economy is struggling... so act fast!

But let's be serious, it's not like we are dealing with Saint Saddam here. We are dealing with a man affectionately called the Butcher of Baghdad, a man who tortures his Olympic athletes for not winning medals, a man who, if he had his way, would bring destruction to all infidels (us in case you didn't know). So any war to bring this guy out of power can't be all bad, right? How could a guy like that ever get into power anyway? Maybe I better ask Reagan...I bet he'd know.

It is pretty clear that Bush will carry out this invasion with or without the support of the people the only question is when. Don't be surprised if it comes about six months from now. Presidential approval ratings soar in times of conflict. So, to the victor go the spoils! Bush stands to gain a lot from this invasion (oil, revenge, something to put on a job application). So America, please don't expect things like opposing public opinion, a failed spin campaign, or declining job approval ratings to stop him.

What's love got to do with it?

It's Valentine's Day, that mushy, red laced, hormonally imbalanced holiday. For all you men out there, stop moping like the Super Bowl has just been cancelled. You'll live to tell the tale, boys, I promise.

Before you begin the old string of excuses for hating today, consider this fact. The very creation of Valentine's Day is the fault of a man.

Erika Lovley

His name was St. Valentine of Rome, and he was crucified on February 14 by order of the Emperor Claudius II. Now this may sound like all the other boring tales of noble saints, but St. Valentine was executed for marrying young couples. Emperor Claudius had declared the marriage of all young Roman men illegal. He felt that unmarried men made better soldiers for his army. While in prison awaiting his death, Valentine fell in love with the jailor's daughter. On the day of his execution, he sent her a love letter signed "From your Valentine."

See fellows, every man can have a romantic side. You need not be a saint or a martyr to the female race. Despite your misconceptions, we women do not expect you to be our lap dog, emotional baggage carrier, or psychic. However, any respectable woman upholds a few basic requirements for her Valentine.

Firstly, before you go stomping around the mall like Cupid shot you in the backside, remember this phrase. "Cards are good, flowers better, stuffies soft, but chocolate never." I lament over the number of times that a sweet but clueless date has presented me with a monstrous heart full of CVS chocolates. It's like receiving your freshman 15 composed into one deadweight box with a cheap rose on top. Don't get me wrong, guys. You hit us girls at the right time of the month and we will kill you for the chocolate. But moderation is the key. If you must give us chocolate, (I personally feast on Godiva), try giving us a five piece box instead of 500. That way, we have our chocolate fix and you won't be blamed for a butt that is too big for a spring break bikini.

Secondly, remember setting is everything. If you want to dazzle us with a diamond, fur, or mushy beanie baby, don't try to give it to us in the middle of the Student Center, during the rat dissection lab, or while we're driving to Northampton. It will ruin the moment when I drive into a ditch on I-91 trying to open the Victoria Secret bag. Make sure the gift is something that will last a little while. Edible underwear does not fit the bill. We like to show our friends how much you adore us.

"If you aren't exactly Shakespeare, try picking up a crayon and making a card kindergarten style."

To the men of the world: if you want to get your special lady underwear, pants, or a cute piece of clothing, follow this age old formula: if you don't know your girlfriend's size, take a very educated guess and subtract one more size. Then purchase. For instance, if you think your girlfriend would fit into a medium, buy a small. Keep all tags on except for the price. She'll be elated that you think she's 10 lbs. lighter than she actually is, and you'll be the scoring champion with her self esteem.

If you men are particularly strapped for cash or still paying off the Christmas debt to Tiffany's, use your creative powers. If you aren't exactly Shakespeare, try picking up a crayon and making a card kindergarten style. She'll cherish it forever.

No matter how destitute you are, do not request that this Valentine's Day be gift-free. The blow to the female psyche is similar to a man whose girlfriend buys him XS condoms. Get the drift?

Perhaps I'm being a little mean, or rather demanding. However, I do know what I am talking about. To all you good guys out there, if you are fortunate enough to have a significant other today, remember this above all: if you are dating someone who actually expects a five-star dinner, exotic plants, and a serenade in a pink gorilla suit, save your cash. Dinner will be digested, the flowers will die, and the jungle song will be committed to selective amnesia. No valentine deserves the precious gems unless you've been dating for a really long time. In college years, that would translate to a little over two months.

Europe's mixed signals

Yousef Munayyer

Some years back, maybe when I was 12, I remember seeing a t-shirt in the street market in Jerusalem with a picture of a fighter jet on it and the words "Don't worry America...Israel is behind you!"

I got a kick out of that. I thought it was really funny since I knew even as a younger child that America's military was superior and that shirt was a mockery.

The events of this week raised several questions and reminded me of that shirt. First, what is the purpose of the U.N.? Why does NATO still exist? Do the American media reflect European popular opinion?

These are by no means easy things to answer but here is what I have reasoned and found out. To begin, the U.N. was created after World War II to avert another major war. I think it has done a good job in keeping the superpowers from obliterating each other. It has helped aid many nations via food, peacekeeping missions, and medical supplies. Its format allows for diplomatic discussion so people can talk out conflict instead of making quick irrational decisions that turn out to be tragic.

However, the U.N.'s major weakness is that it has no way to enforce its legislation. Sure, if there are no vetoes at the Security Council, use of force could be authorized but that rarely happens. Though this does not mean that we should not recognize the U.N. as legitimate or try to push different agendas regardless of what the international community is saying. The self-proclaimed realists, who are calling the shots in Washington, are paying little attention to the United Nations, saying that they will proceed without the U.N. if it comes to it. However, they still are working with NATO.

"Now that the Soviet Union is only mentioned in history books and Germany is a democratic success with no imperial ambitions, why do we bother with NATO?"

It is interesting how these "realists" prefer one international organization over another when a true realist doesn't bother with international organizations at all. NATO is different then the U.N. It was created to assure Germany did not rise to be a threat in Europe again, and to also contain the Soviet Union. Now that the Soviet Union is only mentioned in history books and Germany is a democratic success with no imperial ambitions, why do we bother with NATO? Hasn't it served its purpose?

The school of thought that some in Washington subscribe to would insist that NATO is now only a burden for the United States. They would ask why we should risk lives and money for the protection of others who now can offer us little protection if any. Yet, we hold onto NATO. In fact we continue to accept new members and many more are on the waiting list to get behind America's defenses. I wonder why we put this burden upon ourselves.

Also, Europe is sending mixed signals about the war with Iraq. France and Germany have said they want to work for a diplomatic solution and at this point do not support a war. Germany used to be behind us on the war until a few months ago. Why the sudden shift? Gerhard Schroeder had to reflect the anti-war opinion of his people on the international stage if he wanted to be re-elected. It was simply a democratic decision. If Germans do not want to go to war, their leader shouldn't say otherwise. Maybe President Bush could learn something here.

And as for France, well what can I say? First off, I could make a lot of jokes about retreating and surrendering but that would be juvenile. I could make jokes about how the French are as wimps as many pundits on TV claim, who seem to make a living off of that. But let's not forget the French were willing to put their troops on the ground in the Balkans, we were not. I could also say that both France and Germany have separate agendas with Iraq because they made deals for Iraqi oil, but do you seriously think that would be worth jeopardizing the legitimacy of the U.N. and NATO, the two organizations that kept these no historic enemies from ongoing war or invasion? Jacques Chirac also had to make a decision about what was best for his country and paying for a war that his people do not support with money and lives isn't in his best interest.

Finally, a document similar to an Op-Ed has been passed around Europe much like an attendance sheet, for those who support America's stance on Iraq to sign. The signatories are Poland, Hungary, the U.K., Czech Republic, Slovakia, Spain, Denmark, Italy and Portugal.

I just had to find out what the people of these nations thought about the war. You would think that if their leaders signed such a document that the populous would be for war? Wrong.

In Hungary, Zsolt Nemeth of the Parliament's Foreign Relations Committee publicly criticized the president of Hungary for not conferring with the committee because it doesn't reflect the nation's opinion.

The same can be said for Denmark where their prime minister was also publicly criticized for signing the document without consulting his government. In Poland, over 75 percent of the people polled by the nation's largest newspaper are opposed to a war on Iraq. Outgoing Vaclav Havel of the Czech Republic also did not have the consent of his government on this issue, and for this he was also criticized. And finally in Slovakia, Prime Minister Dzurinda said "we did not make this decision according to polls." (Could it be because Slovakia is rallying for NATO membership?)

So when the media or Don Rumsfeld tell me that Europe (old or new) is with us on Iraq, I don't buy it. Just like I would never buy a T-shirt that says "Don't worry America...Denmark is behind you!"

It's an emo-pop explosion

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

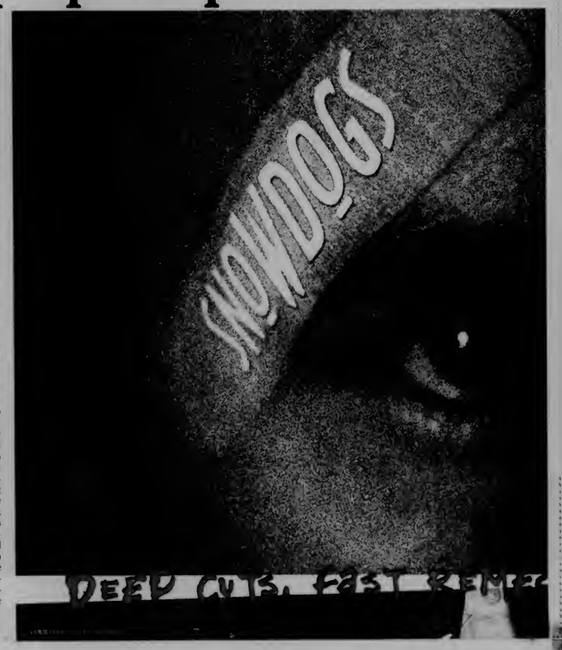
Snowdogs lead vocalist Ville Leppanen sounds like he really means it. Leppanen sings his band's fiery punk-pop rants in a voice that drips with passion. Like many punk singers, Leppanen's voice can be a bit, well, thin. But lacking vibrato hardly matters in Leppanen's case, considering that the singer really, truly commits himself to his music. It's as if Leppanen is feeling every note, every lyric, and every raggedy harmony coursing through his body.

It helps that the Snowdogs know a good hook when they hear one. Despite the low-fi production values of their casing, which suggest a group of formless political ragers, the Snowdogs aren't afraid to bite into a juicy bit of pop when it comes along. "Deep Cuts, Fast Remedies" the new album from the Finland, by way of America, by way of London trio has some of the most memorably catchy hooks of any pop-punk band to come along.

Snowdogs 'Deep Cuts, Fast Remedies' Victory Records

Ville Leppanen and his bassist brother Matt were born in Finland and raised around the world, finally connecting with American-born drummer Benjy Reid in London and taking inspiration for their name from an old Rush song. Their debut, "Animal Farm," attracted solid reviews and touring slots with punk godfathers blink-182 and MxPx, as well as the attention of producer Steve Brown (who has worked with The Cult and Manic Street Preachers among others).

"Deep Cuts, Fast Remedies" is a lean, speedy collection of ferociously addictive songs that plow forth in the style of the Offspring, or bounce around like Green Day, and yet never seem derivative or trendy. Snowdogs sound familiar without being plagiaristic, taking new routes through old terrain.



"Average Kid," like many punk anthems, speaks to the adolescent psyche of the young fans in the same brash, beefy vein of an Offspring song. The infectious "Drive" was born with eagle's talons; that is to say that the song, especially its sing-along chorus, has the ability to stay attached in your head long after you've put away the music to concentrate on adult responsibility. "Drive" is own of those songs that are unforgettable in a good way; they have a way of randomly popping into your during those laggard moments in life.

The band's stylistic diversity is on display on such tracks as the happy, horn-fed ska of "Hour of Sunshine" and the country-pop of "End of the World." Snowdogs reach beyond the scope of most three-piece acts by including such instrumentation as an accordion, harmonica and keyboard. Lyrically, Snowdogs move beyond the usual terrain of modern punk-pop acts – broken hearts, romantic confusion and such. Sure, "Million Pieces" is about dealing with a break-up, while the strutting semi-rap of "Your Sorry Ass" and "Amazon" are about the drudgery of working life. The giddy rock of "Popstars (Love This)" rightfully blasts the phoniness of modern pop music, while "Boy in the Bubble" celebrates embrace of life and "Freedom for Everyone" dissects the "dirty and unclean" politic of modern society. Snowdogs are worthy of receiving the attention that is heaped onto bands like Good Charlotte and New Found Glory.

Somehow less successful than Snowdogs are labelmates Somehow Hollow. The tattooed and hair-gelled quartet arose from the ashes of disbanded Canadian rock band Grade, and like Snowdogs, features a pair of brothers – Brad Casarin on guitar and vox, with sibling Mike on bass (guitarist/vocalist Kent Abbott and drummer Drew Clark round out the group.) Fully formed by September 2002, the Somehow Hollow boys quickly recorded their label debut "Busted Wings & Rusted Halos." The speed with which the group went from the death of Grade to release of an album left one thing behind: an identity.

Somehow Hollow 'Busted Wings and Rusted Halos' Victory Records

Somehow Hollow sound like every other emo-pop act that can be found on Victory, Vagrant, Drive-Thru and every other label that specializes in such music. The whiny vocals (though thankfully not as shrieky as The Used use) picking their way through bruised and overly sensitive lyrics, backed by music played as all out as can be – yeah, it's all here, along with the nonsensical song titles that have nothing to do with the songs themselves ("How Winter Killed Our Souls," "The Witch of Glen Cedar Gate," and "Kamloops" among them). Each song sounds like the next, and they sound like something that's been heard before. These young men play like they believe they are making something worthwhile; their earnest faith and idealism is touching in the face of such vanilla surroundings. But, "Busted Wings & Rusted Halos" is an undistinguished addition to the genre. The weeping, tattoo-covered throngs may eat it up, leaving one to part with only three logical words: for fans only.

A hit and miss effort for Unwritten Law

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

It has got to be a symbol of integrity amongst modern rock bands: the chance to play in an unplugged format in front of a loyal audience. To play the music unvarnished is akin to playing without a net. Minus the studio wizardry so often used as a crutch, rock stars get the chance to prove their chops by relying solely on their musical talents.

MTV has long been a champion of the acoustic format, from its popular early '90s TV series "Unplugged" (now existing as MTV2's "Unplugged 2.0" specials) to "Music In High Places," a more photogenic series of specials that place the artists and their instruments in front of a backdrop of historic monuments and natural habitats.

Unwritten Law 'Music in High Places' Lava

So-Cal punk-pop quintet Unwritten Law was drafted onto the series to perform a handful of their songs among the verdant pine forests and craggy cliffs of the Yellowstone National Park. As a tribute to fans they have released the soundtrack to that episode (much in the way artists from Jay-Z to Dashboard Confessional have released their "Unplugged 2.0" sessions in album form). The "Music In High Places" CD is an eleven-song sampler of Unwritten Law's musical output, most of it culled from the band's 2001 breakthrough album "Elva."

Unwritten Law doesn't seem like the most obvious choice to perform in the unplugged format. Indeed, no punk-pop band seems a natural fit for acoustic performance. The singer/ songwriter mannerisms of people like Dashboard Confessional are more at home in the textures of acoustic music than the ebullient energies of punk are. Unwritten Law's transition from loud punk rhythms to a softer acoustic timbre does come off as mixed, rather than artistically satisfying.

"Music In High Places" turns the band's mosh-pit anthems into a collection of earnest folk-pop tunes, such as with "Before I Go" and "Shallow" (both early tunes for the band). The radio hit "Seein' Red" is robbed of its snap by the new arrangements; the soft verse, LOUD chorus hook of the song is deflated here. Similarly, upbeat rockers "Up All Night" and "Rescue Me" lose muscle.

Occasionally, a transfer works. "Up All Night" may lack spine, but the speed-punk of "Blame It On Me" makes for a feisty honky-tonk thrasher, backed by the rousing whoops and cheers of delighted fans. Surprisingly, the reggae-inflected "How You Feel" turns into a tuneful roots ballad. Best suited for the album was "Rest Of My Life" an already semi-acoustic slow song that beautifully works as folk ballad, unlike "Rescue Me" which refuses to gel as country-pop.

Even though "Music In High Places" is hit and miss, the album on the whole does offer enough moments to glean enjoyment from. The barebones production allows vocalist Scott Russo's nicely ragged vocals to shine, and even the weaker songs on the album are enjoyable; they just lack the fire and venom of the original versions. Unwritten Law is one of the more diverse acts on the punk-pop/rock circuit, and it's nice to see these ambitious young lads experiment with new sonic landscapes. "Music In High Places" doesn't work as a cohesive whole, but it marks a small step in the right direction.

Although sometimes hit and miss, Unwritten Law finds solid vocals in lead singer Scott Russo and creates some punky enjoyment.

Rainer Maria sustains melancholy trend with LP 'Long Knives Drawn'

By Lauren DeFilippo
Collegian Correspondent

Critical acclaim is not something that has ever really been in short supply for Indie-rock outfit Rainer Maria, aptly named after the German poet Rainer Maria Rilke. The band also concedes that it could have just as easily been named The Two Star Music Club. Formerly of Wisconsin, now relocated to Brooklyn, the three-piece has just released its fourth full-length album, "Long Knives Drawn" on Illinois Polyvinyl. With this latest album, Rainer Maria has maintained its melancholy romanticism of life, love and relationships, while somewhat altering the delivery.

Rainer Maria 'Long Knives Drawn' Polyvinyl Record Co.

"Long Knives Drawn," nine tracks deep, follows on the heels of October's three-song EP "Tars Ring." "Tars Ring" though short, served as the harbinger for a slightly modified Rainer Maria persona, one with a sharper, more rock-oriented sound that comes off as more confident and polished. Two of the songs featured on "Tars Ring" ("Alchemy" and "Automatic"), however, failed to make it onto "Long Knives Drawn."

Part of Rainer Maria's appeal, since its earliest beginnings in 1995, has been its ability, despite being a three-piece, to tap into the darker, somber emotions with a unique and sincere frankness that often fall to the wayside during the song writing process. Keeping within this vein, Rainer Maria produced "Long Knives Drawn" with a few changes. The first of these changes was the presence of bassist and lead vocalist Caithlin De Marrais's stronger voice without the backing of guitarist Kele Fischer, on a majority of the tracks. The bonus here is a less dissident sound, which is not bad just different from what fans of their older material might expect. Also for the first time, De Marrais was in control of much of the writing for "Long Knives."

Despite all these changes, Rainer Maria has held on to its characteristic style of intelligent metaphors. However, also present is a hint of the pressure to produce (i.e. that contrived, almost too arty style), but the music is so tight that this can be overlooked. The sentiment "Let's get over each other, so that we can fall in love again," seems very much like the words of a desperate and unrequited lover. The lyrics may very well be suited to that purpose, but is also possible that the dynamic they describe could be applied to a different type of relationship.

Another probable interpretation, which is far less literal, alludes to the sometimes-fragile relationship between artists and their fans. This relationship is particularly tenuous when their musical style or format gets a touch-up or overhaul. What about introspection, plain and simple? Perhaps it was just the intelligent forethought of the band to include it and leave it up to the listener to decide.

Final Game; Round One

Six degrees of Kevin Bacon

Jake D. Lewis

A popular Hollywood myth states that Kevin Bacon is somehow connected to every other actor in show business by no more than six degrees, where a degree is a single link between the given movie star and someone else who has appeared on-screen with him/her. Rumor states that every puzzle has at least one solution.

Send your answers (along with your name, university or college, major and year) to collegianbacon@hotmail.com by no later than noon on Sunday. Following the close of today's game, the points will be tallied, and the final winners for Round One of "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon" will be announced in Monday's Arts & Living. They will be contacted shortly thereafter to claim their prize.

A new round will then begin next on Friday, Feb. 21.

Points are awarded as the following:
GOLD (15 points) - Shortest route, fastest time
SILVER (10 points) - Fastest time only
BRONZE (5 points) - Most creative, thematic route
HONORABLE MENTION (1 point) - All other players with valid solutions.

Viewers fuming over 'Joe Millionaire' boycott threatened by angry watchers

By LYNN ELBER
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES – Viewers were fuming and David Letterman was cracking wise about Fox promotions for "Joe Millionaire" that seemed to promise more than the show delivered.

Fran Marriott didn't make the finalchoice between would-be loves Sarah and Zora Monday night although network hints seemed to indicate that he would. Instead, the episode was mostly a recap.

"We got duped. We totally got duped," viewer Cynthia Wiggin of San Carlos said Wednesday. She dismissed the episode as "total filler. A whole filler night."

CBS "Late Show" with Letterman showed a familiar video clip Tuesday of Osama bin Laden speaking on a cave – but this time he supposedly was filming about Fox.

"The teachers of the infidels has reached a new height," said a voiceover offering a mock translation. "We had been led to believe that last night would be the finale of 'Joe Millionaire.'"

Fox said it didn't intend to suggest Marriott was going to make his decision.

"The payoff was always going to be on Feb. 17," spokesman Scott Grogin said Tuesday. "It's possible we were a little over the top with our promos and we're sorry if people felt misled."

What heard on Fox's official "Joe Millionaire" Web site was smoking with comments from angry fans.

"I really don't know if I am going to watch the last show or not," one person wrote. "At this point I am soooo mad I don't care who wins. Anyone else feel this way?"

"No, I will not watch the finale," read a subsequent posting. "Fox has lied to us, and I feel that they should be punished for that. ... Bad move, guys. It will be a while before I put my trust back into Fox."

Grogin said the network hopes any upset viewers would reconsider. "We would hope that our audience will tune in. If they do they will not be disappointed," said Grogin, who promised that next Monday's two-hour finale would contain surprises. Even the pros found Fox's approach misleading. The entertainment news magazine "Access Hollywood" had reported Monday that Marriott's decision would be revealed that night.

"It just shows how low it can go," said "Access Hollywood" executive producer Rob Silverstein. "I thought it was pretty blatant and I think it upset quite a number of people. It upset us."

Silverstein said the news-magazine's Pat O'Brien "ripped 'em twice" in reports Tuesday.

"Joe Millionaire" itself is built on a lie. The women vying for Marriott's affections think he's worth $50 million when, according to Fox, he's really making $19,000 a year as a construction worker.

"I think that when people get involved in these unscripted shows these days, they know they're in for a ride," Gail Berman, Fox's entertainment president, said last month in defending the concept.

Joe Millionaire might not be smiling for any longer depending on the outcome of Monday's grand finale.

The first sign of spring; Baseball's youngest GM opens his first camp

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

FORT MYERS (AP) – Theo Epstein chatted about his spring training debut for about 10 minutes Thursday. Not once did the phrase, "baseball's youngest general manager," come up.

Boston's GM has settled into a job he's held for less than three months with the same focus as GMs of all ages, watching players obtained in the off season.

Epstein saw reliever Ramiro Mendoza throw and Jeremy Giambi catch balls at first base.

The 29-year-old Epstein even looked on as 83-year-old Johnny Pesky hit grounders to infielders.

"Maybe we go together like ham and eggs," said Pesky, a spring training instructor for the Red Sox. "I just think he's a fine young man."

There's that word again, "young."

It's difficult to ignore Epstein's youth, but he has experience. He spent the past seven seasons _ and seven spring trainings _ with San Diego in jobs ranging from public relations to director of baseball operations.

Last Nov. 25, he was promoted from assistant general manager to general manager. On Dec. 29, he turned 29. On Wednesday, he was like other spring training arrivals, stocking up on the basics at Target where he saw third-base prospect Kevin Youkilis buying Power Bars.

On Thursday at 8:30 a.m., Epstein arrived in the camp of the team he rooted for while growing up a few blocks from Fenway Park.

Pitchers and catchers are supposed to report Friday with their first workout scheduled Saturday morning. But several players showed up early, including pitchers Mendoza, Derek Lowe, Alan Embree and Bob Howry.

Epstein strolled quietly around Boston's five-field complex. He spoke with a fan, joked with reporters and said he wants an open relationship with players while recognizing the need not to undermine manager Grady Little.

That's an extreme change from Boston's GM when spring training started last year, Dan Duquette, who was fired about two weeks later.

"Don't bring his name up. The less said the better," said Pesky, whose role as elder statesman-pregame fungoes hitter was cut by Duquette. "But I like this guy.

"He's not a showoff. He doesn't walk around here likes he's king of the mountain."

Despite their age difference, Epstein and Pesky share the excitement that comes with the start of spring training.

"It's just really good to hear the gloves popping," Epstein said. "It's been a long time."

He feels anticipation more than nervousness and an eagerness "to get everyone on the field to get games started and to see the club come together."

He models his approach after San Diego GM Kevin Towers.

"The goal is to be around enough to be very accessible to everybody," Epstein said, "but not around so much and in such a manner that you're in the way or a distraction or an obstruction."

His main duties are assessing talent, acquiring players and negotiating contracts.

He said staff ace Pedro Martinez called him Wednesday from the Dominican Republic but they didn't discuss the pitcher's contract for which the Red Sox have a 2004 option.

He also said he had nothing new to report on outfielder Kevin Millar, who is trying to free himself from a Japanese team so he can join the Red Sox, who claimed him on waivers.

Epstein planned to make brief remarks to the players – some older than he is – and introduce staff members.

"You want to be friendly and have a good, healthy, productive relationship," he said, but "you can't get too close if it would get in the way of professionalism.

"There are always tough decisions that have to be made, so friendliness and objectivity are the goals."

A year ago, Epstein was in limbo at spring training with the Padres in Arizona after then rejected Boston's request to talk with him about becoming assistant general manager. They finally gave permission in March and he joined the Red Sox at the end of the month.

"I was less angry, more hopeful that something could be worked out," he said. "It was a complicated time."

It was simpler Thursday as Epstein stood in the sun with a light breeze making for a beautiful day.

"I always love the first day of camp, and this year in particular It certainly beats the weather in Boston," he said. "So I'm really happy to be here."

UMass falls in OT 65-59

pointer by senior reserve Amber Sneed at the 3:48 mark. After a Colonial miss, Butler gave the Minutewomen their first lead of the game with a basket that made it 52-50.

After GW reclaimed the edge on a three-pointer by Atlantic 10 Player of the Week Cathy Joens, the Maroon and White took it back when senior guard Ebony Pegues found classmate Nekole Smith for a driving hoop for two of her team-high 18 points.

George Washington's Anna Mantanana missed a three-pointer and Marsheik Witherspoon threw the ball away on consecutive possessions, and UMass regained possession with 41 seconds remaining, nursing a one-point advantage. After Butler was called for traveling, GW had its own chance to take the lead with 19 seconds to go, and it was able to convert.

Star post player Ugo Oha took a feed from Greeba Outen Barlow and connected on a lay-up to give the Colonials a one-point edge with 10 seconds remaining. Pegues would advance the ball past half court and call timeout with four seconds to go, which set up an opportunity for heroics from Butler.

But the senior's first free throw found only iron, setting up a do-or-die situation for the co-captain. Butler was able to sink the pressure packed free throw, one of her 14 points to go along with 14 rebounds, but it was the Maroon and White's last gasp.

The Minutewomen must now rebound and avoid falling victim to the same fate they were faced with last weekend. With A-10 West foe Richmond arriving in Amherst to battle the Minutewomen Sunday at 2 p.m., Dacko hopes her team will not look past the Spiders – as it seemingly did to the Bonnies last weekend – with crucial games against A-10 east foes St. Joseph's and Temple on the docket for next week.

While Richmond is only 6-5 in conference, the Spiders are 15-7 overall and Dacko knows that they are well coached and will come ready to play.

"Richmond is a team that has a lot of young players," Dacko said. "Kate Havin is doing a great job for them, and Joanne Boyle's doing a nice job coaching them. Again, they have a lot of young players and a lot of players who play without fear. They run, and they score a lot of points."

Dacko also sees some similarities between her squad and the Spiders. She hopes, however, that the comfort of being at home after a week's hiatus from Amherst will put the Minutewomen over the edge against Richmond and back on track in the A-10.

"They're like us, they're not doing too well from the foul line, but they've got an inside-outside game," Dacko said. "The fortunate thing for us is that we're playing at the Mullins Center, and hopefully that will be an advantage."

Capital punishment

Jennifer Butler's free throw tied the game at 55-55 at the end of regulation, but George Washington was too strong in the extra frame, beating the Minutewomen 65-59.

Despite taking GW to overtime, Minutewomen succumb in D.C.

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Coming off arguably its worst performance of the season, it was difficult to know what to expect from the Massachusetts women's basketball team prior to Thursday's match-up with Atlantic 10 frontrunner George Washington. Would they come out with the same fire and intensity that saw them manhandle La Salle two Sundays ago? Or would they struggle mightily as they did in losing to St. Bonaventure?

For 40 minutes of play, the answer was most certainly the former, as the Minutewomen were able to compete step for step with the Atlantic 10's best team. But whatever energy the Minutewomen possessed that allowed them to make a run down the stretch – enough to give senior co-captain Jennifer Butler a chance to win the game from the free throw line with .8 seconds left – seemingly ran out after Butler evened the score at 55-55 with just one of two free throws. The Colonials were able to control the overtime, recording the first six points, and outscored the Maroon and White 10-4 in the extra frame to defeat UMass 65-59.

"It was our game," UMass Head Coach Marnie Dacko said. "Our kids came in came in and played their hearts out despite not having a point guard. We had our opportunity at the foul line and missed it. We came out flat in overtime. We made poor decisions both offensively and defensively and it cost us. I thought the momentum would be on our side in overtime, but it wasn't. Missing that many free throws is unacceptable."

GW entered the game coming off its first conference loss of the season, a four-overtime thriller that saw the Colonials fall on the road to Xavier 94-92. The Minutewomen, despite coming off the loss to the Bonnies, looked to be rejuvenated by the return of injured point guard Katie Nelson. However, the sophomore was still feeling the effects of the injury and played only three minutes.

GW was able to take advantage of some early sloppy play, forcing 11 turnovers and converting them into 10 points. They would sprint out to a 10-point lead in front of a spirited Smith Center crowd, holding a 22-12 edge with 11:15 remaining in the first half. The Maroon and White would slash into the lead with a 6-0 run late in the half, narrowing the gap to just three points with just under three minutes to go in the period. However, GW countered with a 7-0 run to close out the half and take a 33-23 lead into the break.

The Maroon and White would begin the second half as GW ended the first, connecting on three unanswered field goals to post a 7-0 run and pull back within three at 33-30. The teams would trade runs throughout the second half, with junior Judit Zsedenyi's three pointer with 11:06 to go, cutting the lead to 41-40.

The Minutewomen would trade baskets with GW for the next two minutes, but then reeled off five straight points and tied the score at 50-50 on a three-

Rivalry is renewed

Minutemen to battle Connecticut in their final non-conference matchup of the season

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Running up and down a tank running toward 20/10, the Massachusetts hockey team will be entering a crucial, two-weekend front the grueling Hockey East schedule. With Connecticut coming to the Mullins Center on Friday night, the Minutemen (14-5-1, 8-5-0 HE) will look to get back into the win column and break their four-game losing streak.

Many experts say the road will be lacking to ensure some of the gaudy records that have topped the top of the conference standings so far this season. That's why Hockey East Coaches are trying to make 21 stops – including one for each squad.

"We expect to play a fairly fast game," Cahoon said. "We expect to control a little bit."

Cahoon also said there could be some fireworks between the Minutemen and Huskies, as the two teams have had significant rivalry in the past. Over the past two seasons, the Minutemen have had significant success at the UConn Cheney, and have posted a combined 7-0-1 record, getting a 2-2 tie, and then nearly sweeping a three-goal lead last season before finally succumbing in a 6-5 overtime.

UMass also was told by conference coaches they are due for the Huskies' comeback earlier in the season. Remember, Jones' shutout streak at least was in part of the Maroon and White knows that the team's losses need to be a premium.

"We can't afford to go out and dismiss Connecticut. I hope we dismiss them on the ice but we can't dismiss the preparation involved with playing the game," Cahoon said.

The Huskies are struggling in the MAAC this year, currently at eighth place, or arguably the weakest conference in college hockey. UConn can beat Boston University in the first 10 – by its newest conference foe, Northeastern, but managed to muster a total of 10 goals against New Hampshire, Connecticut and Providence in a 3-1 contest. While the game might not mean much in terms of Hockey East superiority, the Minutemen are treating it no different than any other game.

"We can't ignore the rivalry that would be a huge mistake," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen dropped the eighth of their last nine games this past weekend when they fell 5-2 on Saturday to UMass-Lowell. The loss followed a 2-0 setback to Boston University in which Sean Fields, last week's Hockey East Defensive Player, made 25 stops to distance the two teams in the standings. One bright spot over the weekend for the Minutemen was the quality play of netminder Gabe Winer. The Stoughton, Mass. Native who returned from his bout with the flu to steer aside 49 of 54 shots (.907 save percentage).

Lappas hopes hard work will pay off

UMass looks to continue winning ways on Saturday

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

UMass coach Steve Lappas called them some of the most physically demanding practices his team has had all year. And after two bruising sessions designed to relinquish the Minutemen of their rebounding hitch, they responded by winning the battle of the boards and the game against a smaller Richmond squad.

They'll face a similar quandary tomorrow when the Minutemen travel to Olean, N.Y. to face a small but tenacious St. Bonaventure squad.

The Spiders and Bonnies pose similar problems on the boards. They're both smaller teams that have guards that are very active on the glass. And they both box out as a team, something UMass has struggled doing over the last month of the season.

"Because of sickness and injuries we couldn't go hard today," Lappas said referring to a Thursday practice he intended to turn into another rebounding exhibition. "But I'll push them tomorrow that's for sure."

The Minutemen out-rebounded Richmond 40-39 on Wednesday and Lappas said he'd give them exactly "one rebound" of leeway in the days leading up to St. Bonaventure.

The performance on the glass was definitely a step up from the manhandling the Minutemen received from Temple last weekend. But Lappas knows his team is heading into an unfriendly atmosphere.

"They've got a great fan base," Lappas said. "It'll be interesting to see our freshman respond."

Galvanized by a crowd that's almost on top of the court at the Reilly Center, the Bonnies will likely press for the length of the contest and pressure the ball with a quick three and sometimes four-guard offense.

Atlantic 10 steals leader Marques Green leads the Bonnies' smothering defense. He's averaging over 2.86 steals and a conference leading 7.86 assists per game.

The Minutemen got a taste of a Green-esque guard when Richmond's Tony Dobbins set a Mullins Center record with eight steals while scoring 15 points.

But despite Green's smallish frame, he's explosive when going to the basket and is more apt to find the open man than Dobbins.

Green is averaging just a touch under 21 points per game, good for second in the conference behind George Washington's Chris Monroe.

UMass has had trouble dealing with some of the conference's more elusive guards including Temple's David Hawkins, Xavier's Dedrick Finn, St. Joe's Jameer Nelson and LaSalle's Gary Neal.

And Green may be the best of the bunch. Sophomore point guard Anthony Anderson will have the task of marking the Bonnies' junior point man.

But Lappas doesn't want Anderson's defensive efforts to affect his ability to create on the offensive end.

"Anthony has shot the ball extremely well lately," Lappas said. "But it's a tough game for him, especially since the kid's been playing so many minutes and they're the type of team of that can wear you down."

Anderson has scored 16 and 18 points in his last two games, respectively, and he's been especially hot from three. He has connected on 10 of his last 19 three pointers against Temple and Richmond.

Along with Anderson's hot shooting, UMass forward Jackie Rogers, whose double-double against RU broke a mini-slump, could cash in on UMass' size advantage.

"It could be a really good game for Jackie," Lappas said. "He's definitely an advantage for us."

Thousands rally in New York

By Scott Eldridge II
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK – Getting to the rally was the hardest part.

Entering the city by train and avoiding the closed roads and narrow traffic streams of downtown Manhattan was the first of many transportation concerns tackled by the thousands of anti-war protesters heading for New York's peace rally this past Saturday.

"I hope this is the peace train," said one elderly woman hopping onto the train in Stamford, Conn. "Grandmothers for peace" read the placard around her neck and the necks of a handful of other women who shuffled to the front car.

"They're expecting 5,000 on the 'peace train,'" touted a report on National Public Radio. The "peace train," as it had been dubbed, was shuttling protestors from New Haven, Stamford and other stops in Connecticut to the rally in downtown New York.

Later in the day announcements at Grand Central specified the train for peace travelers, an accommodation many had not expected. Rushing down the escalators after the rally, one couple stopped long enough to listen for the departing track number.

The increased traffic through the terminal and throughout the area made it difficult for residents to get from place to place. "I don't even know where I am," Pedro Gomes, a resident of Astoria, NY, said. While public transportation was certainly hindered, it was on the streets where the number of marchers stopped the flow of traffic all together.

ON THE STREETS

Thousands of pedestrians left Grand Central and headed up Third Avenue. The rally, which was slated to begin at noon, was two streets over at the intersection of First Avenue and 49th Street, but the areas closest to the stage had filled up hours earlier and travel was being redirected.

Continuing up Third was slow. New York police officers had barricaded the streets connecting to Second and then First Avenues until there was space for the crowds to fill in on First.

"I think right now they have you crossing up at 59th," said one officer. It wasn't until 62nd that many got across.

Without proof of residence or employment, no one was allowed on the connecting streets. Those who tried to dash across the police lines were chased down and reintroduced to the steady stream of foot traffic.

"This is ridiculous," remarked Dave, a demonstrator from upstate New York who had tried in vain to cross the line. "This is really inconvenient," he added.

The officers were in agreement.

"We're cold too and we don't want to have to stand here or chase you down, but there is nowhere for you to go if you get through," one of them said.

U.S. mail carriers were queued outside the Post Office waiting for the sidewalks to clear. Beside the filled sidewalks, ambulances and fire trucks were stopped halfway out of their garages as cars waited for the crowd to clear the road.

STOPPED ON SECOND AVENUE

The march, which had been denied a permit by city officials earlier last week, was unavoidable. With estimates as high as 750,000 for the rally alone, officials had to allow the foot traffic and the makeshift peace parade continued on with few incidents.

"We are marching in the light of peace," sang one couple as it paraded down the roads. Those who had brought radios along with them tuned in to 99.5 FM to hear the rally as it was broadcast live. Richie Havens, Pete Seeger, Bishop Desmond Tutu, Susan Sarandon and Danny Glover were among the more notable speakers at the rally, still several blocks away from thousands of those marching.

Windows were filled with employees of empty restaurants and salons. Residents sipped drinks, ate lunch and even brushed their teeth as they watched their streets fill and any hopes of leaving their apartments dissipate. One young woman trying to approach a salon on 58th Street was turned away.

"I have an appointment at 12:30, I need to get through," she pleaded. A disinterested officer gave a flat "No" answer and turned her away.

The Rhythm Workers Union, a group of percussionists marching with the crowd, played drums along the way. The half-dancing, half-marching protestors moved on until Second Avenue where a line of officers stopped progress all together.

"May as well head back, they're not letting us go any further," one man marching with an "Australian for peace" sign said. At Second Avenue, the shoulder-to shoulder line of NYPD officers compelled the crowd down Second Avenue, asking the marchers to stay to the sidewalks.

One man wearing a flag with a picture of the earth on it led a march into the streets chanting "whose streets, our streets!"

Officers chased after him, saying that he had influenced the crowd to Winter storm buries much of Northeast

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

A powerful winter storm walloped Massachusetts on Monday, dumping as much as four inches per hour in the Boston area. Experts predicted more than two feet worth of accumulation.

Seventeen inches of snow had fallen on Logan International Airport by 8 p.m. Monday night, National Weather Service meteorologist Kim Buttrick said. The western Massachusetts town of Goshen had the most snow with 21 inches.

The heaviest band of snow was expected to continue blanketing Boston for at least another four to six hours after that, fueling speculation that the blizzard might be one of the biggest in city history.

Schools all over the state were cancelled on Tuesday, including the University of Massachusetts.

'It's impossible at this point to try to rank it in historical perspectives,' said Alan Dunham, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Taunton.

The April Fool's Day blizzard of 1997 dropped 24 inches of snow in the Boston area in 24 hours. The record was the Blizzard of '78, which claimed 99 lives and dumped 27.1 inches of snow on Boston, according to the National Weather Service.

Gov. Mitt Romney said the storm was manageable because emergency workers had two days to prepare by watching the storm track up the coast.

The state had 4,000 plows, sanders and other pieces of equipment clearing highways Monday. Police warned people to stay home, for safety's sake and to give plow crews a chance to clear roadways in time for the morning commute.

State Police Sgt. David Paine said motorists appeared to be heeding the warning – no major traffic accidents and no serious injuries were reported during the first 10 hours of the storm, despite over 150 calls for assistance.

'Don't get on the roads,' Romney said. 'We anticipate being able to keep up with it so long as people are off the roads.'

Springfield-based Peter Pan Bus Lines on Monday also canceled all service to Boston and New York City.

The governor told all nonessential state workers to stay home yesterday. Romney spokeswoman Shawn Feddeman said each state agency designated certain staff members as emergency personnel. Those people were expected to remain on the job to help deal with the aftermath of the storm.

Parking restrictions were in place in many eastern Massachusetts communities, including Boston, where officials estimated the snow removal effort was costing the city $68,000 an hour.

Larry Lohnes, 46, of Salem, shoveled snow Monday for exercise and to keep pace with it. 'I'd rather shovel 12 inches than 19 to 20 inches (Tuesday),' he said. 'It's still crazy to me how people panicked after the Blizzard of '78. I'm not in panic mode.'

A blizzard warning was declared early afternoon on Monday for the Massachusetts coastline, and state and local officials braced for coastal flooding.

Logan Airport remained open but more than half of the scheduled 527 departures and arrivals were canceled by 2 p.m. Monday, Massport spokesman Phil Orlandella said.

'They're canceling every minute,' Orlandella said. 'It's going to get worse before it gets better. People desperately need to talk to their airlines.'

Hundreds of passengers were stranded and airport hotels were at capacity because several major East Coast airports were shut down. Many of those at Logan were trying to fly to warmer climates during school vacation week.

Anti-war rally fills streets of New York go down the street. According to announcements published before Saturday, anyone prohibiting the flow of traffic would be arrested for causing a disturbance.

The officers caught up to the fleeing man and, as he sat in protest, arrested him and carried him to a nearby police van.

En masse, the crowd continued in the street. Cars, which had already come to a standstill in the blocked off street were now surrounded by anti-war demonstrators on foot.

"Why don't you come and join us," beckoned one marcher to a driver sitting on the hood of his idle car. "Shut off your cars, don't waste the oil we're about to fight for," said another.

"I would join you if I could, but I'm with you in spirit," said Dave, a driver sitting in front of his stagnant delivery truck.

HORSES AND CROWDED STREETS

By the time the crowd had reached 54th it was stopped again. This time, there was no road to turn down.

The crowd of almost 7,000 was penned between 54th and 55th streets on Second Avenue. Still chanting, the people danced, jumped and thrust fists and peace signs into the air, ever-opposing the potential war in Iraq.

Shortly after the standstill a group of 12 mounted officers rode through the crowd. Yelling for the marchers to get to the sidewalks, the horseback officers used their mounts to force people back. The goal of clearing a path for the stuck cars and trucks, while eventually achieved, was not easily realized.

"Get back!" an officer yelled.

"Where do we go?" was the crowd retort.

With more people in the streets than the sidewalks could hold, the officers were unsuccessful, but persistent. Officers in ballistic helmets joined the horseback riders and tried to push the crowds further. One horse reared back as the front line of protestors scurried back to avoid the flailing hooves. The officer dug his spurs into the now-bleeding sides of the horse and brought it back down.

"What the F!" said one of the "grandmothers for peace" as she was thrown back into the crowd.

This push and shove maneuver continued for 30 minutes before 54th Street was opened and the crowd started to flow down. A handful of protestors cried out "this is where they want us to go," and headed in the opposite direction. Officers quickly detained them as they attempted to march further down Second Avenue.

FINALLY

Now two hours after the start of the rally, the crowd reached its end. Five blocks from the stage, and one street away from a public speaker, the crowd stopped to listen. Still, mounted officers came through to force less than a dozen people onto the sidewalks. These sidewalks were not filled, but the horse was still spun backwards to push the people back.

Political pundits Saturday night said the march and rally will not affect Bush's policy. National Security Advisor Condoleeza Rice said Sunday on "Meet the Press," that the march in New York, and the 600 others around the globe, would not alter the policy.

Two young protestors on the train back to Connecticut posed for their parents. "Our first protest," said Henry.

Millions worldwide speak out Government needs to slow down

About 100,000 people swarmed streets in New York on Saturday in opposition of war between the United States and Iraq. That rally in itself would probably barely have received the attention of the Bush administration, since anti-war rallies have been going on for weeks in the United States.

One significant difference, however, separated the rally from all rallies past, and it should serve notice to the Bush administration on how much opposition there really is worldwide to the stance it has taken.

Saturday's protest in New York was just one of many. From Rome to Tokyo, people gathered across the globe to speak with one voice to stand together in opposition to the war. The numbers were staggering – one million people in Rome, 750,000 in London, 660,000 in Madrid – making it perfectly clear the sentiment shared across the world right now in regards to U.S. foreign policy.

"Let America listen to the rest of the world," Anglican Bishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa told protesters in New York, according to The Boston Globe. "The rest of the world is saying, 'Give the inspectors more time.'"

George W. Bush has long been ignoring the American people as he and his administration do their best to build the case for war in front of the United Nations and the rest of the world. For all of the circumstantial evidence that has been presented, the basic facts remain the same: public support for a war with Iraq remains largely absent, and the limited support that the pro-war movement had diminishes by the day, as Bush approval ratings continue to drop.

"We haven't seen much wide spread opposition like this to any American war at its beginning," Michael Letwin, a member of the group New York City Labor Against the War, told The Boston Globe. "I think you probably will have to go back to the end of Vietnam, when there were massive protests, and before that it was World War II. Does that mean Bush will pay attention? They don't want to listen to anybody... Nonetheless, I think they may not have a choice."

This is what makes rallies, such as the events last weekend across the world so positive. For all of the propaganda and spin that politicians in Washington use to convince us on the necessities of going to war, the fact remains that large-scale grassroots efforts protesting the war speak just as loudly as anyone in a business suit explaining the merits of going to war on television.

"The president has made it clear that he doesn't want to pay attention to what Americans think about this," anti-war organizer Eli Pariser told The Boston Globe in New York Saturday. "So what we are trying to do is show a clear sentiment that he really can't ignore."

That's the idea. As long as people's voices are heard, going to war won't be easy. People across the country speaking out serve as constant reminder to Bush that he was elected to not only make decisions for the American public, but to represent them as well.

Don't blame the soldiers

Rachel Smith

"60 Minutes" featured a terrific story Sunday night about our military's readiness to face a Nuclear Biological or Chemical (NBC) attack. For the first time since U.S. intervention in Iraq has seemed inevitable, the mass media addressed the safety of our armed forces with realistic, if not terrifying clarity.

According to an internal survey conducted by the United States Army, soldiers aren't training properly with their NBC equipment, or perhaps more startlingly, the troops don't take the threat of NBC attack seriously. While the nation is zealously wrapping its homes in duct tape and plastic wrap, the folks who will probably be on the front lines of Iraq aren't concerned with NBC agents.

Well, not exactly.

Mike Wallace emphasized that U.S. Army units have the equipment, but Commanders aren't training their soldiers properly. The problem is not a lack of training – soldiers train in their protective masks and suits regularly from Basic Combat Training on to their duty stations. The problem is that the equipment doesn't work, and troops know it.

Many units, especially in the National Guard and Reserve Components, have old equipment that is literally falling apart. The protective gear the Pentagon is issuing soldiers on the front lines will supposedly be brand new, while the equipment troops train with at home are for only that purpose: training. The problem is since soldiers are training with broken gear, they have little or no confidence in the very thing that is supposed to save their lives during an NBC attack.

Soldiers must go through the NBC Chamber once during Basic Training and every subsequent year that they are in the service. The NBC Chamber is a small room where "tear gas," or CS, is released. Soldiers must go through the chamber with their protective masks on, take the masks off, and then leave. After completing the exercise, soldiers are supposed to have increased confidence and improved proficiency with their equipment.

Unfortunately, residue from the harmless "chemical attack" remains on the protective equipment even after "decontamination" procedures. Soldiers can often taste the gas through their masks even when sealed correctly. If protective gear won't protect soldiers during a harmless exercise, what will happen during the real deal? Sunday's report did little to allay any fears.

"The problem is since soldiers are training with broken gear, they have little or no confidence in the very thing that is supposed to save their lives during an NBC attack."

According to the "60 Minutes" report, the Pentagon recalled defective protective suits, but due to a seriously flawed logistics program, the suits are unaccounted for. In other words, the soldiers on the front lines who are supposed to get the "real" stuff may get issued defective equipment. As if soldiers didn't have enough reasons to be wary of their protective gear, this latest development is chilling.

Clearly, the problems are with the equipment, not the men and women in the U.S. Army. Pointing fingers at military commanders for not training their soldiers, or blaming troops for not participating in training is ridiculous. NBC related skills are among the dozen or so basic skills that all soldiers must know in order to remain in the military, and any soldier that says he/she doesn't know how to use a protective mask is probably lying. However, well-trained soldiers can only be as effective as the equipment they are training with.

Wallace also attacked the use of NBC detectors/alarms, which often give false readings. He was right on target. The detectors aren't complicated to assemble or function; they're comprised of only a few large pieces. The problem is not the operators; it's the equipment. Over five years of service, I've never seen an alarm that works correctly. Of course, perhaps I've only used the "training" models. At any rate, considering troops only have a few seconds to don their protective masks after an NBC attack, a faulty alarm is an extremely scary problem.

If soldiers have given the impression that they don't care about NBC agents, or don't think they're a serious threat in Iraq, the troops are misunderstood. Soldiers train frequently and do their absolute best with equipment that everybody knows is not as effective as it was designed to be and are still willing to put themselves on the front lines.

Our troops deserve better than this. Considering the federal government knew that countries like Iraq and North Korea were probably developing NBC weapons since at least the early 1990s, very little has been done to develop new equipment for our soldiers. Now we are at the 11th hour, and our soldiers have little more than their training and their faith to rely on if Iraq does launch a full-scale NBC attack.

While tens of thousands of people around the country are protesting a war that is most likely inevitable, our soldiers on the front lines are left once again without a voice and without confidence in their equipment. What is reprehensible is not a war that will rid Saddam Hussein of weapons of mass destruction, but a country that fails to provide its army with effective protection against the weapons the soldiers are fighting to protect their country from. Shame on all of us.

Your brain on drugs

Allison Leshefsky

The time has come for the overwhelming majority of college students who smoke marijuana to consider the implications. Our drug of choice has once again been blamed for society's injustice. Apparently, not only does marijuana help support terrorism, it is also responsible for teenage car accidents, lack of gun control and pregnancy.

All of this is according to The Partnership for a Drug-Free America, who has recently purchased millions of dollars in cable advertising aimed at marijuana use. As college students, it was not long ago when we became proud D.A.R.E. graduates and watched advertisements with an egg in a frying pan referring to our brain on drugs. As Bob Dylan puts it, "The times they are a changin'."

Nowadays, advertisements have evolved to become graphic depictions of teenage automobile accidents, homicide and adolescent pregnancy due to marijuana use. But how worthy are these representations? The Core Institute, a non-profit organization that promotes education for drug prevention, conducted a 2000 survey on American campuses. Statistics showed that 84.4 percent of students throughout the country have admitted to using alcohol within the year prior to completing the survey. This is in comparison to 33.6 percent of students that have used marijuana.

"As if this doesn't sound extreme, the Partnership for a Drug-Free America offers an interesting alternative to marijuana. Red meat."

According to the Community Alcohol Information Program of New Hampshire, over 250,000 people have died in alcohol related accidents in the past 10 years. Presently, 25,000 people are killed each year in alcohol related accidents. 500 people are killed each week in alcohol related accidents, 71 people are killed each day in alcohol related accidents. One American life is lost every 20 minutes in alcohol related auto crashes. It is estimated that one out of every two Americans will be involved in an alcohol related accident in his or her lifetime.

But instead of focusing on the real issue at hand, The Partnership for a Drug-Free America has decided to use marijuana as a scapegoat for society's problems, instead of alcohol. As if this doesn't sound extreme, the Partnership for a Drug-Free America offers an interesting alternative to marijuana. Red meat. This alternative is suggested in one of its print advertisements, featuring a photo of a burger joint with the caption, "This kind of joint can help prevent marijuana use by your kids."

Meanwhile, Judge Francis L. Young of the Drug Enforcement Administration claims that one would have to smoke 1,500 pounds of marijuana (20,000 to 40,000 joints) within about 15 minutes to overdose on the drug. Marijuana has never been proven to have directly caused any death.

The only purpose these new commercials serve is the meaningless implementation of fear in the minds of young adults. The effect of this is entertainment for those who choose to smoke marijuana. Students must resume their activities within the happy smoke-filled Amherst valley and bear in mind that the true injustice lies within governmental corruption of our nation's priorities.

SUV owners need to wake-up

James Schaffer

This Saturday a motivated group of about 100 local residents assembled on the Hadley town lawn to protest President Bush's possible war against Iraq. As the protestors were still busy drawing their signs on the side of the road, a roaring SUV passed the crowd with a peace sign sticking out the driver's side window. As the V8 powered SUV blew by the freshly made signs that read "No Blood for Oil" and "How did OUR oil get under THEIR sand" the protestors just grinned. How ironic that they were out there freezing, in part because of this sympathetic SUV owner.

Five minutes later the same thing happened. A gas guzzling SUV flew by, engine roaring, with a couple of peace signs sticking out its dark, tinted windows. Then another with a couple of snowmobiles in tow did the same minutes later. By the end of the day, at least eight large SUVs had shown support to the protesters.

I am willing to bet a large sum of money that these people were not on their way to Northampton Honda to trade in their Suburbans, Expeditions and Tahoes for the latest hybrid engine car. Then why are these SUV owners supporting the anti-war movement that is ultimately designed to disrupt the flow of cheap oil they have become accustomed to? Like most Americans, they display an incredible amount of ignorance, clueless to the effects of their decisions. A newspaper is a foreign object to these people. They think they are educated because they watch Inside Edition or a couple minutes of Fox News each day.

They rationalize their choice of transportation with statements like, "Well I have a couple kids and I have to cart around all their stuff" or "Well its just easier and most importantly safer for me to see when driving." They do not understand the economic and political impact of their decisions.

"...why are these SUV owners supporting the anti-war movement that is ultimately designed to disrupt the flow of cheap oil they have become accustomed to?"

Jane Upper-Middle-Class Doe does not need four rows of leather seating, a built-in DVD player, and a 350hp V8 engine to cart around a couple of strollers, bottles and toys. As Jane drives by the rally with her two toddlers in the back seat, she thinks to herself that war isn't particularly appealing and decides to honk and wave a peace sign. Does she think why there is possibly going to be a war? No, because she doesn't like politics. The last time she voted was for high school prom king and queen. She would rather worry about who is going to be this week's finalist on "Joe Millionaire" or what style is all the rage in Express' new spring line-up. She is displaying stupidity in its purest form. The idea of supply and demand is completely foreign to this person. She thinks gas magically pours from a far away land where the people ride camels and live in sand huts.

Minutes later when Joe Snow Mobile passes by he thinks of his experiences as a teenager in South-East Asia or maybe the Persian Gulf and decides to honk because he too is against war. Joe understands its effects first hand. Does he go a step further and stand for something? Does he make a statement like the hundred or so did on Route 9, or the millions of others did around the globe on Saturday by pulling over his truck and making his own sign. No he does not, because that would infringe on the weekend's snowmobile excursion and deer hunt. Without an SUV he wouldn't be able to cart around his two mammoth snowmobiles in comfort and style. Without his SUV, the weekends just wouldn't be the same. An imported Ve just doesn't have the powerful rumble of American muscle.

People like Jane and Joe need to take a position and believe in it. If you are the owner of an SUV you cannot be against the war in Iraq. Those who passed the rally making peace signs in their SUVs are hypocrites. They lack any understanding of politics and economics. The true anti-war supporters are those who are willing to make sacrifices to support what they believe in.

Now heaven just got perfect

Corner to corner
Emilie Duggan-Hicks

Curt Hennig lived in the spotlight of the squared circle for almost three decades, performing for sold out crowds at arenas like Madison Square Garden and Boston Garden. He wrestled the greats like Hulk Hogan and Bret Hart and Ric Flair, and the not-so-greats like Dennis Rodman. In an era loaded with subpar wrestling, he was a standout both in and out of the ring. He made time for the fans – whether it was chatting with them before a show or even just signing autographs for them when he was in a rush. He was one of wrestling's good guys, regardless of the character he portrayed. He was Mr. Perfect.

On Monday, Feb. 10, in a hotel room in Brandon, Fla., Curt "Mr. Perfect" Hennig's career – and his life – came to an end. Hennig flew into the Tampa area on Sunday evening, did some publicity interviews for the Florida State fair where he was scheduled to wrestle that Monday and headed back to his hotel. Mickey Jay, a referee with Jimmy Hart's All-Star Wrestling show who had traveled to Florida with him, checked in with Hennig Monday morning, and they made plans to meet for lunch around 1 p.m. Curt never showed up. A hotel housekeeper found his body shortly after.

Hennig's career in professional wrestling was a fluke, something he fell into when an injury while playing football at the University of Minnesota led him to Verne Gagne's wrestling camp in Minnesota for rehabilitation.

"It was grueling – 500 squats a day, miles of running, different kinds of exercises," Hennig said in an interview in the May 2002 edition of RAW magazine. "I knew from the moment I got through with that camp that this was going to be my life. I just knew it." Curt was the son of Larry "The Axe" Hennig, a legendary wrestler in the 1960s, and the sport was in his blood. "I wasn't expecting to be a pro wrestler," Hennig continued. "I just wanted to get back in shape."

After a brief stint in the then-World Wrestling Federation, Hennig worked the Pacific Northwest territory before making his way back to Minnesota, the American Wrestling Association (AWA) and his roots. He achieved major success in the regional promotions, and it didn't take long for the WWF to stand up and take notice a second time. When they knocked this time, Hennig was more than happy to answer the door.

"If that door opens up and you pass it up, you're a fool," Hennig, in 2002, said about the offer to re-join the roster. "And I wasn't about to be a fool."

Curt signed a contract with the WWF, and created "Mr. Perfect" with the help of the Federation head, Vince McMahon. He stayed with the WWF for a number of years, until a back injury – then a re-injury a few years later – forced him to step away from the sport. Wrestling lore states that in 1996 he was planning a return to the ring when word leaked out to Lloyd's of London, the company that insured his back in case of injury, that he was planning a return to the ring – against doctor's orders. The company cancelled his policy. Feeling he had been betrayed by the WWF, Hennig chose to sign with World Championship Wrestling (WCW), the WWF's direct competitor. He eventually re-signed with the WWF for one last run in 2002.

As word of his death spread through the wrestling community Monday night, it was not his in-ring success that came to mind when everyone thought of Curt Hennig. His fellow wrestlers talked about his infectious sense of humor, his passion for fishing and hunting, his

Sleater-Kinney impress Pioneer Valley

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – "This is a dance song," said guitarist Carrie Brownstein, deep into Sleater-Kinney's Thursday night show at Pearl Street. "So please... keep dancing."

The shy request tripped off a sly tongue and through a knowing smile; for the entirety of the evening leading to the show's deafening conclusion, the band many have cited as architects of the independent music scene took away the stage, deconstructing broad genre lines in favor of creating a common ground through music for those who had simply come to rock.

And if you can measure the worth of the ground they built by the energy of the crowd inspired to move as one on top of it – mission accomplished.

The band responded from the start with pure reverence and energy for the craft it so uniquely molds. Approaching the night as if there were no tomorrow, it took only a few bars of opener "O2" to prime the audience into a mid-show frenzy: yanking her stylized leads from some greater place as she shimmied across the stage, Brownstein led the 12-string assault alongside guitarist Corin Tucker, preaching to a choir in want of being saved as if it were the first time all over again.

A good majority of the evening drew its energy from "One Beat," the band's 2002 release that swung with a full-on confidence previous issues had already been playing toward. Takes of "Faraway" and the title track reinterpreted the album cuts even further, distilling those moments of studio origin into an organic rebirth that harrowingly punched the venue's slacking facade inside out. Between the moments of sheer authority, the exciting, scattershot riffing on "Combat Rock" that Brownstein secured on record becomes an even more stirring and uncertain thing, gathering audience energy as the song spirals into itself and through the chorus, harmonies breaking like a carousel and meeting at all points between.

It's in those moments, the spaces between where one note is left waiting for the next, supported in the meantime by Corin Tucker's swelling vocals and Janet Weiss's impossibly tasteful fills, where the whole of Sleater-Kinney is revealed. The joyful noise, the clash of guitars and cymbals, the seamless jumps from "You're no Rock and Roll Fun" to "Get Up" to "Words and Guitar" submitted as evidence to the paying jury of how fine a five rock band it is.

Brownstein's cutting, start-stop vocals are the ideal touch upon Tucker's top to bottom howl, while Weiss reaches out into the mix and makes sense of it in a manner you can feel. Eyes closed, marching not in time but seemingly under and around it, Weiss is the dominant note in this band's chord. The combination brought a refreshingly atypical subtlety to a song like "Sympathy," and the proper attention to the relevant re-working of the Creedence political stomp "Fortunate Son."

"Disassemble your discrimination, when violence rules the world outside and the headlines make me want to cry / It's not the time to just keep quiet, speak up one time to the beat," cried Tucker on the rolling "Step Aside." The crowd relented at once. Emphasizing thought over complacency and music as the means to set us free, Sleater-Kinney did nothing more than play an evening of rock and roll – in and of itself, a beautiful thing.

Akron, Ohio, duo The Black Keys opened with an overwhelming set of blues, topped off with a combination of energy and originality for a sound closer to the heartbeat than other likeminded pairs have come. Drawing from 2002's "The Big Come Up" (particularly muscular versions of "Them Eyes" and a jammed-out "Do The Rump"), new material and a choice cover (the Beatle's "She Said, She Said" appropriately dirtied up), the band brought a dose of the Delta to a crowd primed for rock. By all accounts, it'll be welcomed back.

Tips for the men from the women with the advice

Running with Scissors
Melissa Hammel & Lizzy Nielsen

Well, here we are for another week, and the ladies of Running with Scissors are writing a column just for the guys. Dating can be hard, and meeting people is the worst part about it, so we are providing for you a list of things that you should and should not do when trying to pick up women.

TWIN PEAKS

Take our word for it, every woman has been there. You look across a crowded bar and lock eyes with a guy and make your way over to the other side. However, when you finally get the chance to flirt, that all important first conversation, where is he looking? Not at your eyes. Gazing at breasts is likely the worst move to take any man can make when trying to attempting to pick up a woman. Don't doubt for a second that the woman doesn't notice that you are doing it and chances are very good that she doesn't really appreciate it. So for your own sake, avoid looking down her shirt until at least the second conversation or be smart enough to learn how to do it from a distance.

SMELLING BAD

Shower. We keep repeating this in all of our columns because it is of the utmost importance and it will make it or break it point in every pick up. Take it from us – no girl wants to get any closer to a smelly guy than across the room. So prove to us that you know how to use a bar of soap and that you own a stick of deodorant. After all, it can't hurt, right? Smelling badly is the kiss of death, so shower before you go out and put on some clean clothes.

TALKING ABOUT YOUR EX

This rule is simple – don't talk about your ex. Just don't do it. It is the best way to scare off a woman in 3.5 seconds. Little phrases like: "Amy always liked this bar" or "My ex Jenny is a master at downhill skiing" never work. Even if you are trying to illustrate that you and your ex still have a great friendship, chances are that the person you are picking up just doesn't want to hear about it.

TALKING INCESSANTLY ABOUT YOURSELF

A gap in a conversation that you are hoping will go well is always terrifying. However, filling in that pause with a great deal of useless information about

Return of classic characters

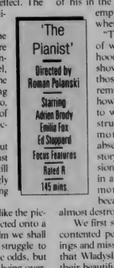
Goodman headlines new Disney sequel

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Correspondent

It's been 36 years since the release of Walt Disney's classic "The Jungle Book" in 1967. This original film was nominated for an Oscar for Terry Gilkyson's song "Bare Necessities." It was the last animated film that Walt Disney himself personally supervised. Re-released in American theatres in 1978, 1984 and 1990, the film was also the idea upon which the characters in the much loved early 90s cartoon, "Tale Spin," were based upon.

"The Jungle Book Two" was released in theatres on Feb. 14. In most other cases, it would be virtually impossible to create a successful sequel to a movie that had become a classic American film 30 years prior. But the beauty of this film is its feasible premise to make a sequel at a later date. What in particular about "The Jungle Book" gives it this time denying power? In the original idea for "The Jungle Book," Mowgli, a man cub raised in the jungle, meets animal pals and then finds his way back to a village of men; this is timeless. Since these films are geared toward an audience of children, this wild boy finds his roots with the help of singing and dancing animals; it's magnetic to curious children. It really is as simple as that. (Think of the favorite children's shows with similar premises: "Sesame Street," "My Little Ponies," "Loony Toons," "Garfield," "Zoobly Zoo" and "Mighty Mouse.")

Another timeless aspect of "The Jungle Book" is that since it is a cartoon, the characters can look the same at a much later date. In a live-action production, even a year later, a sequel can demand new talent. This can be unsatisfying to the original audience who was pleased with the original cast. Drawings, on the other hand, remain the same. However, it is true that the various voice talents collected to produce the original "Jungle Book" 30 years later are very likely not going to sound the same.



However, the producers of "The Jungle Book Two" took this into account. It was decided they would not try to replicate the voices, but they would look for new talent with voices that matched the characters' respective personalities. That is how John Goodman received the part of Baloo, the big, rolly polly, lovable bear. Mind you, this is not Goodman's first experience voicing animation. He has voiced Pacha in "The Emperor's New Groove," Frosty in "Frosty Returns" and, of course, James P. "Sulley" Sullivan in "Monster's Inc." Aside from animation, Goodman is a favorite from the much loved sitcom "Roseanne," and the Coen brother's directing team has given him various parts in "The Big Lebowski," "O, Brother Where Art Thou" and "Barton Fink."

The irony of this multifaceted acting career is that rather than test Goodman's voice capabilities for the part of Baloo by playing audio clips from "Monster's Inc." or another one

A slide show of history reaches the big screen just in time for Oscar potential

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

In the National Holocaust Museum at Washington D.C., there is a walkway that visitors cross three times in their journey through the building. Along the walls to the left and right of the bridge, there are the found photographs and other framed mementos from the homes of the people who were put into concentration camps. The small passageway has a dizzying, yet powerful effect. The chamber takes on a different meaning as an individual traverses it on each of the three floors.

The museum is set up chronologically, and the first time through this short room, we are aware that it is only the start of WWII and the beginning of the Nazi infiltration. On the next level, the timeline has progressed us to the thick of The Holocaust, and we tend to look at the hanging pictures differently than we did just a floor ago, even though we were subconsciously aware of the tragic fates of the people whose portraits decorate the room.

By the third and final level, something about our travels through the history of The Holocaust has brought us closer to these innocents – the still moments of life around us being surprisingly intense glances into the lives of those adorning the hushed room.

Roman Polanski's new film "The Pianist" is like the pictures in this museum, put into action and projected onto a big screen. We start off fully aware that the film we shall see is about The Holocaust and one family's struggle to survive the unimaginable, despite facing terrible odds, but we experience a similar increasing sensation of being overwhelmed by the steady build-up to tragedy soon unraveling before our eyes, being pulled along on the journey of the family as though we were a part of it too.

Yet our emotional response to "The Pianist" varies somewhat from what we might have experienced from the flagship of recent Holocaust movies. Spielberg's "Schindler's List," or even this past year's indie-hit "The Grey Zone" – such pictures (and I use that archaic term because, like "The Pianist," their direction evokes a feeling of still pictures in a flip-book), the audience is presented with stories of the undying spirit in the lives of those inside camps. Here, though, we never get inside the electric fences of Birkenau or Treblinka or Auschwitz. When the family of our pianist, Wladyslaw Szpilman (Brody), is loaded into the trains, he is "saved" by a friend of his in the Jewish police. He flees to the now nearly empty Warsaw Ghetto and tries to stay alive until whenever the war may end.

"The Pianist" works with the intriguing premise of what was going on in the Jewish neighborhoods after they had been evacuated. The film shows how different life was on the outside to those who weren't executed in the camps, again reminding audiences of the terrible thought of how so many people could've turned a blind eye to what was going on. Nonetheless, Wladyslaw struggles to survive in a wasteland filled with more despair than in the camps. The total absence of life in "The Pianist" is what makes the story so affecting. There is certainly Nazi aggression here (including the atrocious death of a man in a wheelchair), but our emotions are triggered more fully by seeing how cold life suddenly became and how the Nazis quickly and efficiently almost destroyed an entire people.

We first see the bustling streets of Warsaw, filled with contented people. Not much later, the obliterated buildings and missing people. The abandoned houses and shops that Wladyslaw seeks refuge in tell more of a story with their beautiful, yet haunting, attention to detail than some films have tried to do with tales of being in the camps. Just like walking through the picture room in The Holocaust Museum.

Knowing that the real Wladyslaw Szpilman wrote the memoir on which the film is based, we as viewers know he

Revisiting R.E.M.'s 'Murmur'

The landmark debut that launched a legend

(This is the first of No Code's bi-weekly glances back to some of rock's most enduring albums.)

R.E.M. – "MURMUR"

Indecipherable lyrics. Murinous drum beats. Crackling, adolescent harmonies.

A blueprint for legend? Yes. A legend in itself? Perhaps.

Much of "Murmur" settles into place with an awkward confidence even now, two full decades after it first dropped on I.R.S. Records. Awkward because it knows, at heart, it's simply a pop album, similar to any one of the thousands given in the years before. Awkward because it knows, deep down, it's a template meant for transition – meant to be expanded upon, broken, built back from the ground on up. Confident because, in that same heart, it knows it's pulled something unique by inviting together – reached up into the universe and plucked the threads nobody else had thought to put together. In that mixture, it's found an elementary form of magic.

Woven into this first album-length exercise by Stipe, Mills, Buck and Berry are the seeds that [illegible] a career. The album was mined time and again by the quartet (and not entirely ignored by the current, Berry-less line-up) for inspiration and direction. When lost, you look for the landmarks you know, and as far as musical milestone points go, few are more concrete than this.

"Pilgrimage" should perhaps be the album's proper starting point as the curtain's are pulled back on Mike Mills' bassline, an effect that begot a fruitful relationship that shadows Stipe's delivery (though at a lesser pace) to this day. Or should it be "Laughing," a liquid number herded by the insistent bass of the ubiquitous Mills? The latter works as a companion piece of sorts musically, with "Laughing," whose heavy drums/bass bottom in the verses [illegible] beautifully by Buck's gilded touches to the choruses and subsequent incarnations. All three carry a natural carrying energy ideal for setting an album down its footprint, a unique texture that...

...not that I'll just state plainly that "Radio Free Europe" doesn't deliver. That song was, of course, the first to be released 'round the world,' propelling the band one-step closer to the bright lights and setting into motion all that would make future recordings possible. It is a tightly wound recording, seamless in its persistence, but held up against the mature, well-versed album that follows, "RFE" is on the personal back burner – nothing more or less, though a warm place for it burns somewhere in my heart. I'll place a more welcome mat for a song like "Moral Kook." With virtually the same backbone as "RFE," listen for the exceptional lengths the band takes in carving out a different path, offering a more unique texture than standard pop-isste generally has to offer.

There's little sense, though, dwelling in the rare misstep. More substantial are the true achievements, the songs that lend weight to the fact that the past 20 years have found the band trying to record a song more fragile, more delicately crafted, more...right than Bill Berry's "Perfect Circle." It's innocence more pronounced now when held against the lavish production techniques the band would explore later in the decade, it still resonates because they did it here, the first time out, with such forlorn vocals from a young and innocent Stipe. That it came from the drummer no less is astonishing, a lasting testament to the influence his own instinct had own the band's sound.

A logical place from there (this, of course, assuming you've listened to and enjoyed the album as it was intended, and are now free to search around and explore in your own manner) is "Talk about the Passion," a simply beautiful song that, with a bit of shine, might have found a home somewhere between "Green" and "Out of Time" – listen for it as a logical step out of the latter's brooding track. "Low," Unconsciously, the band was casting lines into the work it'd later produce – a body as disparate as the slow, organic burn of "Automatic For The People," the glammed out rave-up that was the criminally overlooked "Monster," and the sound-checked, lo-fi grain of "New Adventures in Hi-Fi," which is still the band's best effort in more recent years.

Nowhere on "Murmur," both subtle and pronounced influences (courtesy again of hindsight) ripen. "Shaking Through" rips its glittering intro from a "We Can Work it Out"-era Beatles, while the initial measures of both "9-9" and "Sitting Still" have been plundered by latter day radio pirates staking out their share of the airwaves. "We Walk" is a pleasant enough way to show us the door, if a bit bouncy, while "West of the Fields" calls us back with a grim urgency when we're stepping out – it's at once closing the door on the Story So Far and a fantastic sneak peek to Chapter Two.

It's easy to sit and critique an album some 20 years gone and impossible not to factor in what the band has since accomplished (and note where it has faltered as well). Refreshing as it is now, "Murmur" truly was a sign that change was in the air. Coupled with the likes of U2's own document, "Boy," an energetic guitar front was advancing, ready to dismantle piece by piece the programmed beats that had startled a nation.

Candy and neutron bombs meet at Mount Holyoke

By CAMERON J. WOODS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If there was one word to describe the Mount Holyoke performance of Edward Bond's, "The Tin Can People," directed by Joyce Devlin, it would be 'unsettling.' One set consisting solely of off-white, wooden levels and 10 actors took the audience into an all too believable future earth – an earth 17 years after the devastation of a nuclear war.

The company used brief interpretive dances and vivid, sometimes vulgar imagery, to convey the horrors that they had lived through. Actress Katie Kloss, who plays Fourth Woman, described a part of the aftermath

"...and when I came to a part of town that I did not recognize, I walked into a great white square where a bomb had fallen. There were these brown grease piles, and I thought to myself that they must be giants turds ... but then I saw bones in the giant shit and realized that they were human bodies, and all I could say to them was DIE!"

Soliloquies such as this canvased the sense of insanity that would be unavoidable in such a setting. In one of his opening lines, actor Timothy McDermott proclaimed, "Or paradise was built in the ruins of hell." McDermott plays the role of Second Man, who is the leader of a small band of survivors. They have taken refuge in an emptied military base, which has warehouses filled with "tins," canned food which is the only edible thing that survived the war.

They appear to be a peaceful community, whose only desire is to welcome any other survivors that they find into a loving family unit. However this play takes its first good look at human nature when First Man, played by actress Emily Ruddock, shows up. Ruddock first appeared by crawling out of the orchestra pit and pulling herself up on to the stage. She then began to spout seemingly insane obscenities, until she sees a "tin."

Here, we meet the rest of the settlement who at first seem to be overjoyed with just the site of a young man – all except for The Second Man, who displays jealousy and overt aggression toward Ruddock's character.

As the story unfolds, it is punctuated with short, spoken parts done in a chorus style. These brief episodes reflected what life was like right before the bomb fell. They depict the overcrowding, the competition for everything and the decaying of human character.

When members of the tiny community start to die without any noticeable cause, the accusations fly in the direction of the new comer. All at once, this peaceful band of survivors becomes a bloodthirsty mob bent on ridding the outsider. As their numbers continue to decrease, the group becomes exceptionally chaotic, burning their homes, cannibalizing each other and destroying all of their precious "tins".

Ultimately the remaining few see that they have become exactly like the people who dropped the bombs. With that, the play ends on a melancholy note, where the cast decides to live as best they can, unsure as to whether or not they will survive.

After taking her tearful bows, Ruddock said, "This was really a tough piece to do, considering how the world is. I am just really happy to see that we got such a crowd on Valentine's Day."

love for his four children.

"A bridge between the past and the future of our business has been lost," said Sean Waltman, a former WWE superstar said in a guest editorial on pwtorch.com. "Wrestling has lost probably the last guy from the old 'guard' that wanted to still teach the new guys the right way."

Curt Hennig was not as perfect as his character name proclaimed, and it is not my intent to use this column to canonize him. He made mistakes, both in and out of the ring, but he was only human. All we know for sure, right now, is that the Hillsborough Country Sheriff's declared his death was not a suicide, and there were no signs of foul play.

On Feb. 10, none of the speculation surrounding Curt's death mattered as promoter Jimmy Hart stood in the middle of the ring and broke the news to the crowd that had gathered for that night's show. The 20 other wrestlers scheduled to perform that night stood ringside, their heads bowed, as Curt "Mr. Perfect" Hennig was remembered with a moment of silence. Some cried; some just stood in stunned shock.

Then the bell was rung 10 times in tribute.

And the show went on.

Jamming in Central Massachusetts

By DAVE SIEGEL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

WORCESTER, Mass. – The frigid temperatures outside the Palladium in Worcester served as an obvious contradiction to the smoking tunes served up inside by the Steve Kimock Band and Soulive on Saturday evening. This co-headlining bill allowed ample opportunity for the all-ages crowd to immerse themselves in some amazing music spanning many different styles and genres. After a short warm up set by DJ Axel Foley, The Steve Kimock Band (SKB) took the stage first and immediately began to impress.

Led by the virtuostic Steve Kimock on guitar, formerly of KVHW and the Other Ones, this four-piece outfit seamlessly blasts through mush, stylings ranging from smooth fusion to straight ahead, grits guitar rock. The opener, "Up to You," demonstrated from the start the tightness with which the band flows through peaks and valleys of energy. Building up from a simple, happy chord progression laid out by Kimock, the jams meandered through glorious fills by rhythm guitarist Mitch Stein. His mastery of SKB trials is in its constant adjustment of energy and tempo. The band gracefully roamed through screeching solos, gradually building intensity until finally breaking back into the ghostly main themes. The highlight of the set came about midway through "Thing One," when the entire band brought its volume down to almost a whisper, and upon hand signal by Kimock brought the main riff back up to its full prominence. "Bionic Experiment" was a much-needed change of pace as Kimock jumped onto slide guitar, finally changing his chord progressions to the more heavy, ominous sounding major scale.

Holding everything together was former Santana drummer Rodney Holmes, constantly controlling the pace and flow of energy with his vicious yet tender feel. Holmes, alongside bassist Arne Livingston, set up a sufficient backdrop for Kimock and Stein to color with their dazzling finger work. Livingston was an obvious newcomer as he was reading from sheet music throughout the performance. Once Livingston establishes himself, Kimock will be pushed even further into new musical territory with the addition of some exploratory driving bass lines to play off of. Throughout the set it was apparent how similar every song was in form, timbre and tempo. With a more experienced and dynamic bassist, even this image should shift with more complex arrangements and changing tempos. Overall, SKB played a solid set. It is so rare, nowadays, to see a player completely master his instrument like Kimock does.

After another short set by DJ Axel Foley, Soulive took the stage amidst billowing smoke to accentuate the rather meager lighting. Soulive, despite its short life as a band (about three years now), has been all about change and continual evolution. Starting up in 1999, this soul trio made huge waves in both jazz and jamband circles with [illegible] reputation for outstanding musicianship, and for putting on a great show. With the lack of a varied setlist, the band grew extremely tight, playing what has become known as the Soulive "classics." After a while, playing the same 12 or 15 songs might get a bit boring, so it decided to add saxophonist Sam Kininger into the mix to spice things up. Soon Kininger alone was not satisfactory, so the band added an entire horn section, endearingly called "The Soulive Horns." But the horns were not enough, so it debuted "The Soulive Revue," with an additional freestyle DJ and female soul singer. Finally, the band has decided to skip the sideshow and return to it roots as a standard trio, and that is what the audience got on Saturday.

What could these past favorites work up in their new, reworked form? Although there were moments that stood out, there was disappointment at the overall attitude of the band. Soulive consists of the brotherly duo of Neil and Alan Evans on the Hammond B3 and drums, respectively. Holding the middle ground is the always-exciting Eric Krasno on guitar. Despite getting into the groove early with a few, newer tunes, the band soon lost me. They simply could not hold my attention. Whether it was the disjointed sound system of the cavernous Palladium, the sea of adolescent faces or the lack of excitement onstage, something did not click. They have one more chance to rekindle what had once thrilled fans on April 26 at Pearl Street.

Lead guitarist Steve Kimock and his band opened their concert on Valentine's Day with "Up to You."

GOING FOR THE GROPE

There are some people who are affectionate by nature, and that is okay. What does not work, however, is trying to be affectionate or demonstrative when you are picking up a woman. If you have only been speaking to each other for a total of three minutes chances are there is no reason why you should be trying to hug her or pet her hair. This will not get you a number; it will get you a restraining order.

'The Jungle Book Two' swings into theaters

COURTESY DISNEY ENTERPRISES

of his cartoon roles, the sound crew at Disney played a sound clip from "Barton Fink" against a short animated clip of Baloo in "The Jungle Book." This is how they decided on Goodman for the role. (For those of you who don't get the joke, Goodman played somewhat of a murderous sadist in "Barton Fink.")

In an interview in the media pamphlet for "The Jungle Book Two" Goodman claims, "I relate to Baloo too much. We're both overweight; we both love music; and we both don't sing so hot. And I think I've got fleas!"

Of course, credit has to be given to Haley Joel Osment, who played the voice of Mowgli. Haley Joel's acting career began as Forrest Gump, Jr. in "Forrest Gump." He is now nationally acclaimed for his roles in both "The Sixth Sense" and Spielberg's "A.I." Another voice talent worthy of mention is Jim Cummings, who played Kaa and Colonel Hathal, and was the original voice for Winnie the Pooh and Tigger. And of course, Phil Collins was the voice talent of the vulture Lucky.

A new addition to "The Jungle Book" bunch is loveable Ranjan, who ranks up there as the little boy, and equally adorable, counterpart of Boo in "Monster's Inc." New talent Connor Funk voices him.

Much of the timelessness of the original film was molded through the songs that are passed down from generation to generation of children. The sequel to "The Jungle Book" would be very dissatisfying if there wasn't a return to original songs like "The Bare Necessities" and "I Wanna Be Like You." It was hilarious to observe parents and their children belt out every word to these songs; this is surely a way to close the generational gap between children and parents. However, a new composer was brought in to write the sheet music for the sequel. Joel McNeely is a very talented musician, who also scored the "Tiny Toons Adventures" and "Dark Angel" television series.

Songwriters Paul Grabowsky, a composer for Australian television, and Lorraine Feather's, goddaughter of Billie Holiday, were also responsible for the new lyrics particularly notable in the new song "W-I-L-D."

"The Jungle Book Two" provides audiences with a rare chance to see a conglomeration of unlikely talents come together and produce a fantastic sequel of classic worth. You need an excuse to see this film while it is in the theatres. Let out the kid in you, or better yet, the dancing bear in you, and get your paws on a ticket to this film.

'The Pianist' captures emotion in its portrayal of The Holocaust will survive, despite there being several close calls along the way. Indeed, it might be a stretch of dramatic license to say that music is what ultimately saved the pianist's life, but the greater meaning shows us that all people – Jews and Nazis for this purpose – do have one, common concept of beauty at the very least. Political bodies may indeed change. Tragedy may occur, but the arts remain. It is something even the inhuman Nazis were well aware of and respected greatly, the movie stresses.

Music was one of the most important types of art for Wladyslaw's generation. It was able to tell stories and evoke feelings across any racial and religious boundaries; it's arguable that movies are the equivalent for being most easily accessible to all peoples today. As such, the pictures that Polanski paints in "The Pianist" are full of art, emotion and the vibrancy of life.

Adrien Brody stars in 'The Pianist,' a film claiming that music transcends all political ideologies.

This series can be similar to compared to the poetry slams in New York City throughout the 80s and 90s. The series overflows with talent and energy as young poets read their stories and poems.

The New World Theater began as a modest experiment in 1979. Now it has become a regional arts leader, earning a national reputation as a visionary cultural institution. The New World Theater's primary mission is the presentation and production of works by playwrights of color.

AMHERST – The Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts Amherst will present an Off Center series production of "Brazil" Dance Theatre on February 21 and 22 at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. The performance will showcase the choreography of artistic director Augusto Soledade, a native of Brazil and a current Assistant Professor of Dance at Smith College.

Soledade utilizes the music of a variety of Brazilian composers with a multi-media performance that will include live musicians. His choreography will focus on the Brazilian goddess Iemanja through the use of video and storytelling.

Soledade began his dance training at the Federal University of Bahia and later received his Master of Fine Arts in Dance from the State University of New York at Brockport. During his time in the United States, he has taught at many universities including the University of Michigan, Wells College and the University of Rochester. Soledade mixes contemporary and Afro-Brazilian movement styles to create a unique multicultural event.

[illegible] should be compared to any [illegible] first thrill ride, it's "The stuff." The doctor also attacks another guest at the hotel, Jilly Jackson, before apparently burning up in a car accident in the parking lot, as he attempts to escape. His parting words to his victim is that "the stuff" will have a different effect on each of them and also that they will be people looking for them, who open finding the test subjects and kill them. Fleeing for their lives, Dylan, Shep and Jilly set off to find whoever is trying to make sense of this nightmare that's coursing through their veins while slowly coming to grips with their newfound powers.

Every now and then though, and as much as this book is such a great read, Shep's character is the only part of the novel that feels like pieces in pranting it a garbled message. As much as I was hoping to stay away from comparing Koontz to King, Shep is one of those stock characters the former author enjoys using – one who, on the surface, is slower than those around him but ultimately harnesses the driving power. When Shep is not unleashing his amazing new talents (which I will not spoil for you), he could be a cross between Rain Man and Forrest P. Whoever. His stubbornly resistant behavior might be charming on the big screen, but reading what it sometimes several pages of him sputtering "I'm not so picture-grate-ful" to attention upon it the tasks. On the one hand, these moments are okay to skim through, ranking the 500 plus page book slightly shorter, but part of me worries that some advocates of handicapped people will have a negative reaction to Shep's treatment as a character, for it is likely that a reaction to him like my own here does not put autistics in the greatest light. Perhaps I'm being overly harsh, but nonetheless, unlike other books that use people with disabilities for pivotal moments only for poetic license, here Shep's purpose is much more sensible and couldn't have as much an impact as it would if he were not mentally challenged.

Apart from the thin line Koontz treads with being politically correct, the payoff at the end is quite pleasing. We are reminded that things are not always what they seem and you can't judge a book by its cover. Likewise, it'd be unfair to automatically criticize "By the Light of the Moon" just by the author's name on the cover, as some readers are prone to do. It boils down to the magic that is found inside – not just inside the author or the characters, but in the story that captivates with its supernatural splendor.

contest, including representatives from all four lines. The physical line of Craig MacDonald, Peter Alden and Steve Jacobs was quite impressive, working hard in the trenches to disrupt the Husky breakout all evening and scrapping its way to a second period goal, courtesy MacDonald.

"I thought MacDonald and Jacobs and Alden played a pretty strong game," Cahoon said. "That's as good a game as we've gotten out of a third line in a while."

One thing the Minutemen did take away going into next weekend's crucial set against Maine was that college hockey has no pre-determined outcomes.

"Any team can beat any team on any night," Degon said. "If anything, we go into Maine with a fighting chance, knowing we can beat them."

"We had to win this game and everybody knew it. We did it, it wasn't pretty," Pock said.

"If we play like this against Maine, it's probably not going to end with two points for us. But we've got a week to prepare, and I'm pretty confident that we'll get at least two points against Maine next weekend."

Captain Tim Turner and the Minutemen held off a feisty Huskies squad as they look towards this weekend's pair of home contests with Maine.

Minutemen struggling to overcome key injuries

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

It all makes a little more sense now.

For weeks, fans have had reason to ask, "What's wrong with this team? Why hasn't it performed the way it did in the beginning?"

After jumping out to an 8-1 start, the best in the program's history since the 1968-69 squad won its first nine games, the Minutewomen have mustered just four wins in the last 14 games.

The initial cause of the slide probably had something to do with the two-week layoff they took before heading down to Gainesville, Fla. for what would be the first two losses in the 4-10 streak.

The beginning came after a two-week break between a 77-61 win over Northeastern and the first game in the Sunshine State, a 78-70 double-overtime loss to Florida.

But a two-week break shouldn't derail a team that showed so much promise in its pre-conference season; one that boasts the nation's best rebounder in senior Jennifer Butler.

What Sunday's loss showed was that UMass has fallen into a battle of attrition. Sophomore Katie Nelson was the first in a line of players to lose playing time, and while Nelson's knee injury may be the most important, there are new names among the injured, making things difficult for the Maroon and White.

Cleo Foster, who was averaging 22.8 minutes per game before Sunday, was scoring just two points per game. But her presence was felt on the floor, even if it wasn't on the score sheet.

Foster is suffering from an unspecified malady, and will be out of the lineup until the Atlantic 10 Tournament, per Dacko's orders.

Freshman Cindy Gonzalez has surprised fans this year. In eight games played, she has shown growth since her wide-eyed beginnings. Gonzalez was also out due to a nagging injury, but may see time before the end of the regular season.

When Foster and Gonzalez walked out to the floor Sunday, dressed in their warm-ups just like Nelson, it was a troubling sight. Especially after hope began to creep back into the picture.

Nelson, who started practicing last week, actually played four minutes in the game against George Washington on Feb. 13. But then the five-foot-seven guard hobbled off the court, and was scratched for the match up with Richmond.

Nelson's backup, Monique Govan, has also been feeling the effects of the season.

"Mo's hurt," Dacko said after Sunday's loss. "I won't say she's hurt, but she's had a nagging, ongoing back injury.

"I won't call it an injury," Dacko added, tip-toeing around the school injury policy. "But she's not where she needs to be physically."

Govan did show up on Sunday, though, and played 25 minutes, scoring nine points. But her injury is just an example of the toll being taken on the players.

"It seems like we're just dropping like flies," Butler said. "It's just a chance for other people to get in and give us something, because we are down on bodies."

Without Foster and Nelson down the stretch, the Minutewomen will be forced to change a gameplan which, until now, has relied on three solid guards – Nelson, Foster, and Ebony Pegues – to run the offense. Now, Pegues is the lone experienced starter, and Govan's nagging back trouble will haunt Dacko's squad until Nelson returns.

With tournament time looming, every nagging little knee tweak or ankle turn becomes critical, because while no one can deny the talent on the UMass roster, that talent means nothing sitting on the bench.

Ebony Pegues and a shorthanded Minutewomen squad suffered through a poor performance and fell to Richmond 69-57.

Ryder, Desmond lead Spiders past UMass 69-57

"They were packing it in on us with their zone, forcing us to hit the outside shot, and we weren't," Boyle said. "When Elise came in, they stayed with the same strategy and that gave her the open looks and she started knocking down shots.

"What she brought more than the 3-point shooting was the attitude of 'hey, we're not going to lose this game,' and because of that both our offensive and defensive intensity picked up. She gave our kids confidence down the stretch to be able to perform better."

While Dacko agreed that Richmond's senior co-captain hurt the Minutewomen with her shooting, she hardly caught the first year coach off-guard.

"[Ryder] didn't catch us by surprise," Dacko said. "We knew she was her 3-point shooter and she still hurt us. We came out man-to-man and couldn't stay with them…so we had to go to a zone at that opened the outside for her to hurt us."

By the time sophomore guard Monique Govan ended a 6-27 long Maroon and White scoring drought at 1:27, it was too little to late for the Minutewomen.

"We were struggling with the different lineups we were forced to send out there tonight," Dacko said. "We're just not the kind of team that can dig a hole and get ourselves out of it, let alone when we have so many players sitting out."

Groups require an initial screening that can be arranged by calling 545-2337 or stopping by at 125 Hills North, Monday – Friday 8 am-5 pm.

Rogers paces UMass 76-66

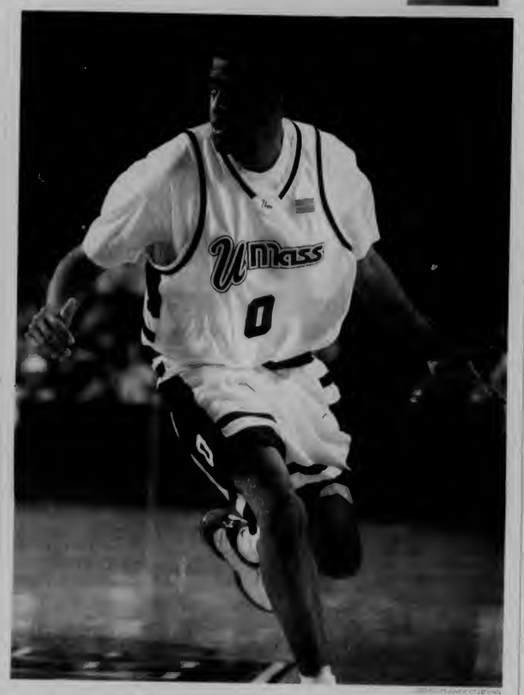
Rogers led five UMass players in double figures with 20 points, including a 10-27 effort from the field. The Minutemen finished the first half with a 9-0 run behind a 3-pointer by sophomore Anthony Anderson and a dunk by Rogers.

Previously, players Anderson, Jasmine and Jeff Viggiano combined for 18 assists and six turnovers – despite being covered by the one of the best defensive player in the conference Grant, who stands second in the A-10 in steals with 2.78 per game.

"It just be's so small," Anderson said. "You always where the ball is. You have to be very careful when he's around you.

"We had a lot of great plays by our point guard tonight," Lappas said after the game. "Three of Anderson, Jasmine and Viggiano combined with Marcus to score 45 points."

Whalen turned the ball over 16 times and the Bonnies committed eight



UMass PLAYER OF THE GAME

Jackie Rogers

Sophomore Brennan Martin's chipped in with 10 points, including clutch shooting down the stretch, in propelling U Mass over the Bonnies.

Michael Waltrip wins abbreviated Daytona 500

By JENNA FRYER
AP Sports Writer

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) Michael Waltrip hoisted the Daytona 500 trophy above his head in a crowded garage surrounded by family, friends, fans and foul weather.

Then he took off running through the rain.

"I don't care if it's raining – we're going to Victory Lane!" he yelled, not bothering to see if anyone was following.

For a driver with as few victories as Waltrip, nothing was going to stop him from making this a celebration to remember.

As black clouds closed in, Waltrip was pulled to the front of the pack by his teammate Sunday to take over the lead in the Daytona 500. When the sky opened up, he retreated under an umbrella with his wife, the two of them wishing the rain would never stop.

It didn't, and Waltrip was declared the winner of the rain-shortened race. In 535 career starts, Waltrip has three wins – all at Daytona and two in NASCAR's biggest race of the season.

Unlike the first win, when friend and boss Dale Earnhardt was killed in a wreck on the last lap, Waltrip was able to enjoy this one.

"I'm at peace with what occurred that day," he said. "But I will never close that chapter. I never want to close a chapter on any part of my life, especially not when it comes to losing my friend like that."

With weather the wild card of this race, Waltrip and his crew had to play a guessing game to win.

Jimmie Johnson got gas only and Waltrip took two tires on what teams expected would be the final pit stop before the rain.

Foul weather had already pushed the start of the event up almost 30 minutes and caused an earlier stoppage of more than an hour, and no one expected the race to be run in its entirety.

Johnson had the lead, Waltrip was in second and time was running out.

Dale Earnhardt Jr., the favorite to win here only to have his chances ruined by a bad alternator and dead battery, helped his friend and teammate take the lead on the last green-flag lap.

Earnhardt, running a lap down, pulled Waltrip past Johnson for the lead.

Caution came out moments later when defending race winner Ward Burton hit the wall, rain began to fall, and the race never resumed, ending 91 laps short of the finish.

"I had a plan," Waltrip said. "I knew what I had to do. I had to get behind Junior. I did that and I was able to squeeze out the win."

Kurt Busch finished second, followed by Johnson and Kevin Harvick. Mark Martin, last year's series runner-up, was fifth, with Robby Gordon sixth and defending Winston Cup champion Tony Stewart seventh.

"Of course I would have loved to race until the end. I felt we had a shot to win the race," Johnson said. "But I'm not disappointed. We never thought we were running an entire race. I just wish I was leading when the rain came."

Waltrip's first Winston Cup victory came in the 2001 Daytona 500, in his first race with Dale Earnhardt Inc. After his latest victory, Waltrip paid tribute to the seven-time Winston Cup champion and Daytona's winningest driver with 34 victories, including the 1998 Daytona 500.

"I'm so thankful – thankful for Dale Earnhardt," Waltrip said. "He made this place so special over the years. He was about this race. I know he's smiling now."

This was the third time in the race's 45 editions that the Daytona 500 was shortened by rain. Fred Lorenzen ran 133 laps in winning in 1965, and Richard Petty took the 1966 race in 198 laps.

Waltrip has practically owned Daytona's famed 2 1/2-mile oval the past few seasons.

He finished second to Earnhardt Jr. in the 2001 Pepsi 400 and was fifth in last year's 500 after winning a qualifying race. Three-time Winston Cup champion Darrell Waltrip's younger brother finally got to fully enjoy a victory in July, taking the 2002 Pepsi race.

The tandem of Waltrip and Earnhardt Jr. dominated this 500.

Junior led 22 laps and was still out front when he started having electrical problems. He finally slowed on lap 88 and drove slowly into the pits the next time around. He lost two laps – and his shot at victory.

Waltrip led three times for a total of 68 laps, including the final four.

Orioles pitcher Bechler dies from heatstroke

Player's temperature reached 108

By STEVEN WINE
AP Sports Writer

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. (AP) – Baltimore Orioles pitching prospect Steve Bechler died of heatstroke Monday, unable to recover from a spring training workout that sent his temperature to 108 degrees.

An autopsy will help determine whether Bechler had been taking the dietary supplement ephedrine, which has been linked to heatstroke and heart attacks.

Broward County medical examiner Dr. Joshua Perper acknowledged a published report that a bottle of a supplement containing ephedrine was found in Bechler's locker.

Regarding the bottle, Perper said: "My understanding is it exists, but we don't have it."

A workout Sunday left Bechler pale and dizzy, and when his condition worsened, he was carried from the clubhouse to an ambulance on a stretcher. He spent the night in intensive care and died at 10:10 a.m. Monday at Northridge Medical Center.

His wife, Kiley, due to deliver the couple's first child in April, was at his bedside. She and Bechler, 23, married last year.

William Goldiner, the Orioles' team physician, said Bechler died of "multi-organ failure due to heatstroke."

"He would rebound at times. They thought they were getting ahead of it, and then another organ system would fail," Goldiner said at a news conference at Fort Lauderdale Stadium.

Bechler, at 6-foot-2 and 239 pounds, had battled weight trouble in the past. Asked about the pitcher's conditioning, manager Mike Hargrove was quoted as saying it was "not good."

The temperature at noon Sunday was 81 degrees and the humidity was 74 percent, the National Weather Service said.

Goldiner said he wasn't aware of any evidence that Bechler had been taking a dietary supplement such as ephedrine, which has been banned by the NCAA and NFL but not by Major League Baseball. The Orioles' policy is to discourage the use of the amphetamine-like stimulant, he said.

"Weight-loss drugs are never prescribed by us," Goldiner said. "They're never condoned by us."

Orioles spokesman Bill Stetka said he could neither confirm nor deny a report by The Washington Times that a bottle of a supplement containing ephedrine was found in Bechler's locker.

"We'll cooperate in every way with the medical examiner's office," Stetka said. "Everything we find we'll turn over and apprise them of."

Perper said his medical examiner's office would begin an autopsy Tuesday, and that it could be two or three weeks before the final results are known.

Said baseball spokesman Rich Levin: "We're going to wait to find out more about what happened."

Funeral arrangements were pending.

A native of Medford, Ore., Bechler was a third-round draft pick by the Orioles in 1998.

"Steve was a tough guy; he was a competitor," Hargrove said. "I didn't know him that well, but I knew him well enough to know he loved the game and loved to compete."

Bechler made his major league debut last September, going 0-0 with a 13.50 ERA in three relief appearances. He was expected to begin this season with the club's new Triple-A affiliate in Ottawa.

He spent most of last season at Triple-A Rochester, going 6-11 with a 4.09 ERA in 24 starts. He had a 33-48 record in five minor-league seasons.

Orioles players were briefed about Bechler's condition during a clubhouse meeting before Monday's workout. They were summoned inside a short while later and told of his death, and the rest of the day's training schedule was called off.

"They told us about the situation, and everybody was in shock," pitcher Rodrigo Lopez said.

Bechler fell down while running drills Sunday and Hargrove said he could tell Bechler wasn't feeling well toward the end of the run.

"He was about 60 percent of the way through it when we noticed that he was a little white-faced," Hargrove said. "He was leaning against a fence ... which isn't unusual when guys get tired. We put him on a cart and brought him in and called the paramedics."

Bechler's parents did not learn of his death until they arrived in Miami on Monday. Orioles executive vice president Jim Beattie said. They had traveled from their Oregon home after Bechler fell ill.

Bechler's wife was driving from Oregon to Florida when she was reached by cell phone with the news her husband had been taken to the hospital. She took a flight from Salt Lake City on Sunday and arrived in Fort Lauderdale shortly before midnight.

In 2001, heatstroke was blamed for the death of Vikings lineman Korey Stringer, who collapsed during training camp. Stringer's widow has filed a $100 million wrongful death lawsuit against the team and its doctors.

Last season, baseball was stunned by the death of St. Louis pitcher Darryl Kile. He died in June from blocked coronary arteries while in Chicago for a game.

Joe Castellano, a radio play-by-play broadcaster for Baltimore's Triple-A affiliate last season, said Bechler was proud of making the majors from Oregon.

"He was one of my favorite players that I had ever been around," Castellano said. "He had a great personality. He was everything that was good about baseball."

Ugly win for Minutemen

Thomas Pock's school-record five points carries Minutemen

By Matt Brady
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was doubtfully the way Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon planned it out. But having lost eight of its last nine, an 8-6 victory over Connecticut was certainly an important win for his squad.

Thomas Pock scored the game-tying and game-winning goals late in the third period for the Minutemen (15-13-1, 8-13-0 Hockey East), capping off a school-record five points in a game for a defenseman. It also extended UMass' undefeated streak against Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference foes.

UMass	8
UConn	6

"I don't think that really matters," Pock said of the streak. "I just wanted to beat UConn."

His first goal of the night came at 14:21, as he took the puck deep in the defensive zone and went end to end, beating goalie Jason Carey to cap off the rush. The game-winner was more the type that Pock has scored many times this season – a laser from the point. His defensive partner, freshman Marsin Degon, added a goal and three assists of his own.

"It's always nice to see points, to see production, but this whole season hasn't been about points for anybody," Degon said. "It's been more of a team effort this year than any team I've ever been on."

However, Pock was not without flaw on the evening, as his double minor penalty at 4:25 of the third – resulting in a power play goal by Joe Schuman that brought UConn to 6-5, 5-11-3 MAAC within one and gave the momentum to the Huskies. It also left Pock riding the pine for an extended period.

"It took a couple stupid penalties," Pock said, pointing to himself. "I got a little frustrated. Coach Cahoon yelled at me and I didn't want to lose against them.

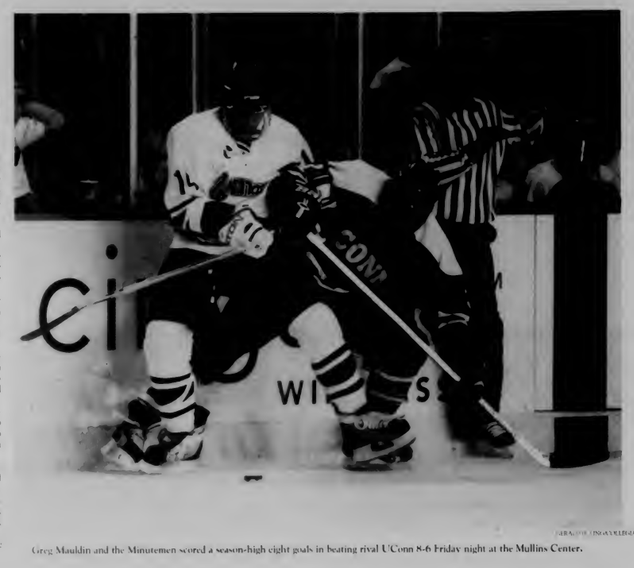
"First I punched him, then I cross checked him because I figured the punch wasn't hard enough."

Cahoon was none too pleased with Pock's decision.

"Tommy Pock's penalty was just about as bad a penalty as you can take," he said. "A good a player as he is, there's no excuse to take a penalty like that. Thank God he's got the gifts that he has. He put on a little show at the end there, but that doesn't excuse the lack of discipline."

Kurt Kamienski and Ron D'Angelo scored within a stretch of 1:09 to give the Huskies a 6-5 lead with 8:40 left in the game. The sparse crowd at the Mullins Center drew silent in fear of watching the first victory by a member of the MAAC over a Hockey East squad.

"If we play them often enough, sooner or later they're going to win a game," Cahoon said. "I didn't think it should happen [Friday]. A lot of things are burning us right now and they showed themselves [Friday night]."



The Minutemen led 3-1 after the first period and 5-2 with less than a minute to go in the second, but an Adam Rhein goal with 2:5 seconds left in the middle frame cut the lead to two and sent UConn on a four-goal run.

UConn's second goal drew UMass netminder Gabe Winer past the right faceoff circle to try to steal the puck away, and D'Angelo snuck around him and slid the puck into an open net.

"I think he was really bothered by his decision on the second goal," Cahoon said. "I don't think Gabe gets affected by too much. He gives up a bad goal every now and then, he's able to move by it, but I think that stuck with him. I don't think he ever really shook that off."

Jackie Rogers' 26 points propel UMass past Bonnies 76-66

By Jim Pignatiello
COLLEGIAN STAFF

OLEAN, N.Y. – Maybe it's because he grew up less than 200 miles away. Maybe it was due to St. Bonaventure's lack of a strong inside presence. Or maybe it was coach Steve Lappas calling out his senior leadership earlier in the week.

For whatever reason, Massachusetts senior Jackie Rogers may looked comfortable in UMass' 82-76 win over the Bonnies at the Reilly Center.

All Rogers did in Olean, the closest he has played to his hometown of Syracuse, N.Y., was lead the UMass to victory in one of the toughest places to play in the A-10 with a career-high 26 points on 11-for-15 shooting. The Maroon and White's power forward added 10 rebounds for his third double-double of the season.

UMass	76
St Bona	66

"Jackie Rogers really hurt us inside," St. Bonaventure coach Ian Jan Breda Kolff said. Overall, the Minutemen outscored the Bonnies in the paint 30-14.

Rogers scored 22 points in the second frame as the Minutemen came back from an eight-point halftime deficit.

"I knew he could play good in this game but I didn't know he'd get 26," said UMass coach Steve Lappas. "Jackie Rogers played really hard and aggressive in the second half. In the second half, he dominated the game.

"We were playing a team which didn't have great size," Lappas added.

Forward Brennan Martin capped off a 15-5 UMass run to start the second half with a 3-pointer that gave the Minutemen their first lead of the contest since 2-0.

The Bonnies answered immediately, as senior Joe Shepherd knocked down a trey on the other end, but Martin responded with another one from downtown and was fouled by Jamil Terrell. Martin completed the four-point play to put the Minutemen up by three with 14:27 to go.

"The four-point play was really big," Lappas said. "He came off the bench ready to play."

Martin scored a career-high 10 points on the evening.

"Brennan Martin hit some key 3s, which hurt (as much as Rogers') inside play(s)," Kolff said.

The two teams traded leads 10 times until Jackie Rogers scored a layup on the offensive boards, giving the Minutemen a 63-61 lead with 7:22 remaining.

UMass never trailed again.

Junior Marques Green carried St. Bonaventure early. The 5-foot-7 point guard scored the Bonnies' first 14 points on four 3-pointers and two free throws and finished the first half with 19 points.

"I thought we had opportunities to come up with the game," Kolff said. "It came down to the little things, which we did in the first half, and we didn't do in the second half."

But UMass went to a box-and-one defense with freshman Mike Lasme on Green and held him to just six points in the second half.

"(St. Bonaventure) is a team you don't play conventional against," Lappas said of the combination defenses he threw at the Bonnies. "It helped us tonight by not playing big."

"I was just trying to keep [Green] in front of me and not let him get an easy shot off," Lasme said. "I think I did a pretty good job."

Lasme, who is playing with a broken wrist, played 39 minutes on Saturday.

"I knew there was no way [Green] was going to do that for 40 minutes . . . Michael Jordan couldn't do that for 40 minutes," Lappas said after Green shot 1-for-10 from the field in the second half. "At halftime, they had made nine 3s and we were only down eight. I thought we were in pretty good shape."

Behind Green, who shot 6-for-10 in the first half, the Bonnies led throughout the opening frame. After SBU's Mike Gansey drilled a 3-

Minutewomen fall to Spiders 69-57

By Mike Marzelli

When sophomore Katie Nelson went down with a knee injury in her team's loss to Dayton, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko chose not to let the point guard's absence serve as an excuse for her team's poor play or lack of execution. In keeping a positive face on it, Dacko and her players chose to view it as an opportunity for other players to step up and prove themselves.

Just over two weeks later and with two more guards having joined Nelson on the bench in street clothes, the injury problems for the Minutewomen have officially become a viable excuse for their troubles.

"It just seems like they're dropping like flies," senior co-captain Jennifer Butler said. "It's tough for us because we seem to be losing a new player every week."

With junior starter Cleo Foster out until the postseason and freshman reserve Cindy Gonzalez inactive for the game and day-to-day in addition to Nelson, the Minutewomen (12-11, 4-8 Atlantic 10) were forced to use a variety of lineups and combinations, none of which could lead them to victory, as they fell, 69-57, to the Richmond Lady Spiders (17-7, 8-5 Atlantic 10) on Sunday afternoon.

"We're playing a lot of kids in different positions where they haven't really gotten a lot of playing time," Dacko said. "I'm just forced to ask different players to do things that are really out of their comfort zone, and obviously that's going to hurt us and it really did tonight."

Richmond opened the game with a quick 12-4 burst, fueled by sloppy passing and poor ball handling from a UMass team with only one true guard in the starting lineup. Senior guard Cammy Desmond, along with UMass' shaky ball control, was the catalyst for the last start, scoring six of her game-high 20 points during the run.

"She had a great day for us," Richmond coach Joanne Boyler said. "She carried us in the first few minutes and kept us in it the whole game.

"But we had 17 steals, and that's how we won the game."

The Maroon and White clawed its way back on the legs of four three pointers from four different players. It capped off an 8-0 run on the last of the flurry of threes from junior guard Judit Zsendenyi to take a 20-17 lead.

The sloppy play continued, however, as the teams traded baskets for the final 10 minutes of the half and left the Minutewomen with a slim 36-32 edge at the break.

"They weren't doing that much," Butler said. "It was more that we were doing it to ourselves. We weren't taking care of the ball or being smart, and that kept us from pulling away or taking control of the game."

UMass opened with the first two buckets of the second half to build the lead back to seven, but continuous sloppy play highlighted by several of their 22 turnovers and poor shooting from both the free-throw line (6-of-12 for the game) and from behind the three-point arc (1-of-11 in the second half) again kept the Minutewomen from pulling away.

"When you outrebound teams and do the things you need to do but then get the senseless turnovers, it's painful to watch and even more painful for me to watch," Dacko said. "We hurt ourselves from the foul line too. You're just not going to win ball-games when you shoot 50 percent from the line."

Despite its struggles, the Maroon and White still found itself leading 52-48 with 8:14 remaining in the game. However, senior guard Elise Ryder sparked a 13-0 Spider run over the next 4:24 by hitting four consecutive 3-pointers to give Richmond a 61-52 lead, one it would never relinquish.

Fundraising foundation introduced to campus

By Barbara Lotto
Collegian Correspondent

In a move to heighten volunteer involvement for fundraising, Chancellor John V. Lombardi announced last week the creation of the University of Massachusetts Amherst Foundation.

The purpose of this private, nonprofit corporation is to raise private funds for the UMass campus.

Lombardi was encouraged by UMass' capacity to raise significant funds in its last capital campaign. In 1996, former Chancellor David K. Scott established Campaign UMass, which raised $1.3 million in private donations in four years.

"He created the belief that the campus could establish a culture of giving. Now we need to build on that success," Lombardi said. "The campus has the ability to participate at a higher level of private fundraising."

Provost Charlena Seymour agreed with Lombardi.

"Campaign UMass showed us that we can raise money," she said. "Now we want to work in an organized way to secure more money. We want to achieve as much as many comparable institutions, and we certainly have a good leader to do so."

Chancellor John V. Lombardi

"There are individuals beyond the campus who think highly enough of this institution to support its well being," Seymour added. "We can't depend upon the state to support our institution to the manner in which we are accustomed. We need to bring in more resources."

Seymour said people who give money to the University take comfort in knowing it will be used on campus, for it gives them a more specific picture and "better-tailored story" with which they can associate themselves.

Development important

Elizabeth Dale, interim vice chancellor for University Advancement and executive director of the UMass Amherst Foundation, said development on campus has been a priority and a commitment from the top.

The foundation's officers and members of the board of directors will begin by researching what the campus needs. The foundation will start out with 14 development officers who will represent each of the University's 10 schools and colleges, the athletic department, University libraries and the Fine Arts Center.

There is also the potential of an additional 14 officers to be hired within the next several years.

Projects already in planning include the construction of a new 200,000-square-foot Integrated Sciences Building to be located near the related science and technology departments, a new building for the visual arts, the renovation of a facility for the School of Nursing and the creation of the Chancellors' Merit Scholarship Fund. Dale said the fund already holds $100,000.

Seymour said the foundation is extremely interested in hiring experienced faculty. The money raised by the UMass Amherst Foundation will allow the University to offer competitive salaries as part of their incentive, she added.

Fundraising will also help to support endowments for distinguished professorships, according to Seymour. She said it was important to bring in high-profile people from specialized areas from which students do not normally have the opportunity to learn.

Greek housing questioned

Referendum to be added to March ballot

Senate Speaker Dan Saunders listens to Student Trustee William Powers make his opening statements at yesterday's SGA meeting.

By Dan LaMothe and Lizzy Nielsen
Collegian Staff

The passage of a motion placing a referendum question on Greek housing on the upcoming SGA presidential election ballot highlighted a productive evening for the Student Government Association yesterday.

The motion will give students the option to vote Greeks and residents of North Village, Lincoln Apartments and Hilltd House as commuter students, as opposed to having their own electoral district on the March 12 and 13 ballot.

"This is very important to us," Senate Speaker Dan Saunders said. "This matters to how our Senate elections work right now. This motion would put a question on the ballot asking what people think Greeks should be counted as in our elections."

While there was some debate on whether or not the question should be on the ballot, it passed with little opposition.

"This motion tonight allows the Senate electoral districts to follow the pattern that has been established by past senates," said Jason Bissonnette, the secretary of administrative affairs. "Combining Greeks, North Village, Lincoln residents and Hilltd, more students are given the opportunity to be active student leaders within the SGA under the commuter realm, opening many more Senate seats to those residents. [It] now more accurately represents their needs as students not living in the residence halls." Concerns were raised regarding possible lapses in student representations. Saunders reassured the Senate that this would not be the case.

"It will remain one senator for every 250 students," he said.

The SGA also passed a motion yesterday in response to the Faculty Senate voting last Thursday to ban smoking on

Billiards hall to open next week

By Dan Baker
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students will soon have a new place to hang out during their free time as the once defunct game room reemerges next Wednesday, sporting a new look and a complement of new games.

Located in the Campus Center basement across from the Hatch, the former game room will open as Union Billiards and host a number of new features aimed to please students. While pool is still the game of choice, taking up a majority of the space with a total of nine regulation tables, the area now also holds air hockey tables, darts, arcade games and a jukebox. Union Billiards managers hope these changes will draw students in and provide them with a fun place to spend their time.

"The old game room used to have 11 regulation tables, ping pong and that was it. We decided to change it up a little and give kids something else to do besides pool and ping pong," said Paul Macgregor, manager of Union Billiards. "That's why we added the jukebox, the foosball, air hockey; we're going to have some dartboards, TV and couches. We are just trying to create a fun place for kids to come."

Managers also hope to be able to sell food in the hall, although due to wiring problems this will not be something offered at the launch on Feb. 26.

"We are going to offer food, but we are still trying to work out the issues right now," said Macgregor. "We have some electrical problems where we can't plug in as much stuff as we would like. We might try to work out something with the Hatch to try to get food to come over here. That's still in the air."

There will be no admission price, with eight of the billiards tables rented by the hour. The cost for this will be a flat rate of five dollars an hour. One table will be coin operated, allowing users to pay per game, rather then for the full hour.

The former game room was closed just over two years ago when asbestos was found in the UStore. In order to keep the UStore running while renovations took place, alternative locations were needed to provide temporary housing for the merchandise in the store. The game room was chosen as a temporary satellite location for the UStore, in part because of tepid interest that students had in it. As a result, the pool tables were put into storage, while the renovations took place on the UStore.

When the renovations were completed on the UStore and it once again opened, ideas were tossed around about what to do with the space the game room once occupied. Among the ideas considered were a CD shop or a travel agency.

"There was a really basic questionnaire in The Collegian either last semester or the semester previous to that, asking people whether they should have a music store, CD place or a travel agency here other than a games room," said David Hansen, student manager of Union Billiards.

Hansen said the campus needs more places like Union Billiards, ones with more recreation activities and places geared toward students and their leisure time.

"Right now, a lot of kids spend their time during breaks laying on the couches down in the Campus Center basement watching TV," he said. "I'm sure some people get sick of that... this is the perfect place to come and kill some time."

Macgregor said the operators are interested in student feedback.

"If there is something they want to see in here that we don't have we'll try to give it to them," he said. "If there is something in here that needs to be taken out because it's not going so well, we'll try to do that too."

Union Billiards opens Wednesday, Feb. 26 at 11 a.m. The regular hours of operation are Sundays from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m., Monday through Wednesday from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., Thursday and Friday from 11 a.m. to midnight and Saturdays from 5 p.m. to midnight.

Two million dollar donation made

By Eugene Tetlow
Collegian Correspondent

The plan to build a new $80 million, 140,000-square-foot science building at the University of Massachusetts has received a huge boost with the donation of $2 million from two husband-wife alumni teams.

To make the project a reality, UMass is hoping to raise $20 million in private funds and sees this donation as a step in the right direction.

The $2 million pledge was made by Kathleen and Robert Mahoney, who both graduated in 1970, and Barbara and Richard Mahoney, who graduated in 1955.

"The Integrated Science Building will place UMass in the forefront of research institutions that are making valuable discoveries by breaking down the artificially created barriers between chemistry and the life sciences," said Richard Mahoney, a distinguished executive in residence at the Weidenbaum Center on the Economy, Government and Public Policy at Washington University in St. Louis.

A retired chairman and chief executive officer of the Monsanto Company, Mahoney added, "It is a sobering thought that we are only now following the lead provided by nature – mankind, animals and plants got there first."

The four donators were the first generation of their families to attend college and see the new science-building project as a way to give back to the college.

"For the Mahoney brothers, UMass was our only hope for a college degree," Mahoney said. "As President Bulger says about UMass, 'It's all there.' UMass was there for the Mahoneys, and through this gift, I know it will continue to be there for young scientists in the years to come."

Chancellor Lombardi received the donation thankfully.

"The Mahoney family has made an important and direct contribution to the core function of the University – teaching and research," he said. "Our students and faculty and the citizens of Massachusetts will be the beneficiaries. The Mahoneys have planted a seed that will grow into a cornerstone of UMass-Amherst's academic imperative. We are delighted and thankful, and we will honor this generosity by carefully nurturing the Integrated Science Building to its full potential."

UMass President William Bulger said UMass will be forever grateful for the Mahoney family for the donation.

"This family has demonstrated, time and again, an appreciation of the educational opportunity that the University of Massachusetts provides to its students," Bulger said. "This gift will create opportunities for a new generation."

The aim of the project is to harness the campus teaching and research expertise in the fast-emerging life sciences. It is hoped that interdisciplinary teams of students and researchers in chemistry, biology, animal science, neuroscience and other disciplines will come together in the facility's classrooms and laboratories to teach, learn and discover.

Both Robert and Richard Mahoney were chemistry majors, which they credit as the one of the main reasons why they saw this project as the one in which to invest.

Bush to offer new war resolution

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush is again challenging the United Nations to threaten to use force against Iraq if it does not disarm. A new Iraq war resolution will be offered to the U.N. Security Council this week or next, his spokesman said yesterday.

"If the United Nations can't enforce its own resolutions – a resolution which, by the way, has been around for 12 years – it says something about its utility as we head into the future," Bush said yesterday.

"I think it's in our country's interest that it be effective," Bush said, as U.S. and British diplomats tried to work out a resolution that was tough and could also clear the U.N. Security Council. "We'll see whether or not it's got the capacity to be effective."

Although previously declining to discuss the timing of such a resolution, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Wednesday: "The president intends to work with our friends and allies to offer a resolution either this week or next at the United Nations Security Council."

"And the president has made repeatedly clear that the preferable outcome is for the United Nations to act," Fleischer added. Earlier, Fleischer said, "the president is committed to moving forward."

Bush discussed Iraq and the war on terrorism Wednesday morning with the emir of Qatar and Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri, Fleischer said.

Meanwhile, Turkey and the United States failed again Wednesday to agree on the size of an economic aid package that would open the way for Turkey's parliament to approve the deployment of tens of thousands of U.S. combat soldiers there.

Turkey has delayed a vote on the troops, saying a multibillion-dollar aid package must first be approved that would compensate Ankara for any losses during a war with Iraq.

Fleischer said the United States has made its final offer.

"I think either an agreement will be reached, or no agreement will be reached," he said. "There comes a moment when plans must be made, decisions must be made, and cannot stretch on indefinitely."

Dozens of countries have lined up to object to war with Iraq and to declare they detected willingness by Iraqi President Saddam Hussein will benefit most from the foundation. The protest will serve on the board to advocate academic programs and projects.

Raising money for the UMass-Amherst Foundation will draw from the work of the Alumni Association, a volunteer based organization that keeps graduates connected to the University through activities and events. The purpose of the UMass-Amherst Foundation is to keep alumni connected through philanthropic support.

Former Chancellor David Scott

Provost Charlene Seymour

Although the Alumni Association will not work directly with the foundation, its volunteers will play a critical role in choosing to participate, said Susan Mattei, assistant vice chancellor for alumni relations and executive director of the Alumni Association.

The alumni know the true value of UMass," she said.

MORE OF THE SAME

The UMass Amherst Foundation will also draw from current fundraising tactics, including the University's Annual Fund, which distributes mail solicitations and uses the phone program to raise money. In the phone program over 100 undergraduates personally call alumni, parents and friends asking for donations.

The UMass Amherst Foundation will initially employ a major gifts officer someone who makes contributions between $1,000 and $100,000. It will be the responsibility of the first gifts officer to entice major donors for these significant gifts to campus.

Lombardi expects that as fundraising efforts become more successful the number of major gifts officers will increase to five within the next three years.

Most of the money raised by the foundation will be applied as current use money, but some will be put into the University's endowment account and invested. Dale said. Current use of the money is given directly to the campus for immediate expenditure on things like programs.

The endowment for the UMass Amherst Foundation comes from the interest of the University's central endowment account. Dale said that while the money in the account cannot be touched, the $30.5 million in interest goes directly to the campus.

Seymour Dale and Mattei all support the chancellor's UMass Amherst Foundation without reservations. Seymour said campus officials would have no choice but to "limp along with whatever handouts we are offered" if such a fundraising foundation was not instated.

"We wouldn't be able to perform at our best [if] we were working in an unpredictable environment," she said. "Students grow to have different expectations from the University, and expectations cost money to meet."

A SUCCESS BEFORE

Dale pointed out that universities such as Iowa State, Michigan State and Purdue have all established successful foundations for fundraising that accept significant multimillion-dollar gifts on a regular basis.

"It's the right move for our campus," Mattei said. "The campus-based foundation is very important, because it's getting more competitive to make people aware of the needs of the UMass Amherst campus. It's opening doors for fundraising opportunities, and that is absolutely crucial."

According to Dale, this will dramatically change the landscape of fundraising at UMass.

Since the start of the campaign for Purdue in July 2000, it has raised over half of its $1.5 billion dollar goal within the first three years of the program. Over $672 million in gifts and pledges have been collected, according to the Purdue web site.

The Iowa State University Foundation was created in 1958. According to its website, it was established to fund scholarships, improve facilities and create programs benefiting students. Its expendable dollars reached $30.7 million in 2000-2001.

Much of the success of Scott's first capital campaign remains on campus today. Alumni clubs increased from six to 40, Alumni Association membership increased from 8,000 to 12,000 and Alumni Association assets increased from $300,000 to $3.5 million from the start of the program in 1996.

Money from Campaign UMass also supported the construction of the Harold Alfond Management Center, the new addition to the Isenberg School of Management.

Security campaign launched

By JOHN J. LUMPKIN
Associated Press

CINCINNATI (AP) – Telling Americans to be ready for terrorist attacks, Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge launched a public relations campaign Wednesday that offers families a few basic steps to prepare for the worst.

The message: Have a communications plan so the family can get in touch during an emergency; put together a disaster kit with a few days of critical supplies, and know where to turn for information during a crisis.

"We will not be afraid. We will be ready," said Ridge, who traveled to Cincinnati to announce the program and meet with safety and emergency workers at the local Red Cross. "Make a kit! Have a plan! Get informed!" he said.

Homeland Security officials said the campaign launch has been a year in the making and not tied to the orange – "High" – terrorism alert that began more than a week ago.

Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge speaks at the Cincinnati office of the American Red Cross yesterday.

Officials said they crafted the campaign to avoid scaring people while providing some commonsense ideas that will help families find and care for each other when normal government and emergency services aren't available.

Many of these steps are worth taking to prepare for natural disasters as well, officials said.

This includes keeping a three-day supply of water, food and medicine, Ridge said. Among other things, the government-recommended "kit" also includes duct tape and plastic sheeting Ridge said could be used to seal off a room in the event of a chemical or biological release.

"Stash away the duct tape – don't use it!" Ridge said.

With shades of the duck-and-cover campaigns of the Cold War, the Homeland Security blitz will include television public-service announcements and fliers that will be distributed with Yellow Pages phone directories.

Brochures can be obtained at post offices or by calling 1-800-Be-Ready. Also, a new web site, www.ready.gov, is online.

The television spots will feature Ridge prominently, along with some New York City firefighters, police officers and other emergency workers.

The trip to Ohio marks Ridge's second public engagement outside of Washington since taking over the nascent Homeland Security department. The previous trip was to Florida, another key electoral state.

The Ad Council – the nonprofit group that came up with Smokey Bear's "Only you can prevent forest fires" and McGruff the crime dog's "Take a bite out of crime" – helped put together the campaign.

The ads don't seem to have a single catch phrase, although most of them include the words, "Be ready."

The campaign is essentially free to taxpayers, officials said. It is starting under a $5 million donation from the non-profit Sloan Foundation, and will rely on tens of millions of dollars of donated ad space and air time to get the message out.

One billboard will be going up in Times Square in New York City later this month.

The Martin Agency, an advertising firm in Richmond, Va., developed the multimedia campaign pro bono, according to Homeland Security officials.

Greek housing motion passed campus in all areas that have restricted airflows, to remove smoking lounges from all residence halls and to ban tobacco advertisements on campus from student-run publications.

The motion calls for the administration to not rule on the Faculty Senate recommendation regarding areas under the jurisdiction of the SGA.

Bissonnette worked on the motion with its sponsors, Chair of Public Policy and Relations Adrienne Girard and Senator Levi O'Brien, and called for a referendum question on the presidential ballot, asking students if they feel smoke in the residence halls necessitates a ban in public spaces all over campus.

"The Faculty Senate did not consult with the SGA through our normal legislative processes to obtain our input on how students will set standards in the residence halls regarding smoking, nor did they consult with regards to the administration of our student-run publications and the censorship of advertisements in such departments," Bissonnette said.

Saunders in his opening remarks said he will be meeting with University of Massachusetts Police Chief Barbara O'Connor next Wednesday to discuss issues surround public safety on campus.

"One of the faults of the SGA is that we really only focus on public safety when something bad happens," Saunders said. "It's about time that we start acting and stop reacting."

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy also presented a report at the meeting detailing public safety at UMass and comparing it to other "sister school" institutions across the country of comparable in size.

Among other things, the report states that "aging safety policies and programs" at UMass do not have a large enough presence on campus and require vast updates.

The previously deadlocked election for an at-large Southwest Senate seat was also resolved last night, with Rukia Dahiras getting the necessary two-thirds majority to defeat Republican Club President Christopher Carluzzi.

An announcement of the launching of a search committee for the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs position was also announced. According to Saunders, the search committee will include four undergraduate students.

"I can't remember any other search of this kind of caliber that had this many students," Saunders said. "It shows that the administration takes the undergraduates seriously... rather than just giving them lip service."

The Ways and Means Committee Chairman made a general announcement to all registered student organizations on campus. All RSOs have until today to touch base with the SGA and register for a budget workshop. Without a budget workshop, no RSO will be considered in the SGA budget.

Iranian jet crashes; 302 soldiers dead

By ALI AKBAR DAREINI
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) – A military plane carrying 302 members of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards crashed in the mountains of southeastern Iran on Wednesday, killing all on board in the country's worst plane crash ever, state-run media reported.

The plane was en route from Zahedan, on the Pakistan border, to Kerman, about 500 miles southeast of Tehran, state-run Tehran television reported. It crashed about 20 miles from its destination.

The Russian-made Antonov airliner operated by the Iranian military lost contact with the control tower at 5:30 p.m. Wednesday, according to the reports.

The official Islamic Republic News Agency said rescuers at the crash site had confirmed all 302 people on board were killed.

It was also the latest in a string of plane accidents the Iranian government has blamed on U.S. sanctions, arguing that they have prevented the country from repairing and replacing its aging fleet.

Trade between Iran and the United States has been frozen under sanctions Washington imposed after the 1979 takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The news agency said the plane's passengers and crew were all members of the Revolutionary Guards, an elite group under the direct control of supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. The guards protect Iran's borders and defend ruling hard-liners in this ultra-conservative society.

State television and radio did not offer reasons for the crash and did not address the possibility of terrorism. There was heavy snowfall in many parts of Iran on Wednesday, including in Zahedan, which hadn't seen snow in three years.

Associated Press efforts to reach provincial officials were unsuccessful early Thursday.

Tehran television quoted an anonymous official as saying the forces had visited the impoverished Sistan-Baluchestan province, of which Zahedan is the capital, for an "important mission."

The government issued a statement offering condolences to the families of the victims, television and radio reports said.

Iranians were preparing for an Islamic holiday on Thursday, the feast of Velayat, when Shiites believe Islam's prophet Mohammad appointed his son-in-law, Ali, as his successor.

Wednesday's crash was the deadliest in Iranian history with the toll surpassing the 290 killed on July 3, 1988, when an Iran Air A300 Airbus was shot down over the Persian Gulf by the USS Vincennes. The U.S. military said it misidentified the plane as an Iranian fighter, an account disputed by Iran.

In December, Transportation Minister Ahmad Khorram acknowledged that Iran's air industry was suffering from U.S. sanctions on purchases of American-made planes and warned of air disasters if the trade ban wasn't lifted.

The minister, speaking days after the Dec. 23 crash of a Ukrainian An-140 plane that killed 46 scientists, said several of Iran's aging Boeing and Airbus planes have been grounded because of technical problems and lack of spare parts. He said Iran's fleet was more than two decades old and has "reached a crisis point."

Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, Iran has supplemented its fleet of Boeing and European-made Airbus airliners with planes bought or leased from the former Soviet Union.

In February 2002, a Russian-made Tupolev Tu-154 airliner carrying 119 people smashed into snow-covered mountains not far from the destination of Khorramabad, 230 miles southwest of Tehran.

In May 2001, 30 people – including the then transportation minister – died when a Russian-made YAK-40 crashed in bad weather.

Bush to present new war resolution to United Nations to cooperate with weapons inspectors.

"The inspection process in Iraq is working and Iraq is showing clear signs of cooperating more proactively with the inspectors," South Africa's U.N. Ambassador Dumisani Kumalo said.

The appeals for extended inspections mirrored the stand taken last Friday by most nations on the council, who stiffly resisted Secretary of State Colin Powell's assertion that Iraq still was not cooperating with U.N. weapons inspectors.

Over the weekend, protesters took to the streets around the world in anti-war demonstrations that rivaled those of the Vietnam War era.

Declaring that America's security should not be dictated by protesters, Bush said Tuesday he would not be swayed from compelling Saddam to disarm.

"We will deal with him," Bush said.

"War is my last choice," Bush said at the White House. "But the risk of doing nothing is even a worse option as far as I am concerned."

Standing firmly against skeptical allies as well as the demonstrators, Bush said: "I owe it to the American people to secure this country. I will do so."

Administration officials in Washington and at the United Nations in New York were discussing the possible gains as well as the risk of a diplomatic defeat if the United States proposed a new resolution to the Security Council to endorse force as an option to disarm Iraq.

Snow straining budgets

AMELIA H. MATTHEWS/COLLEGIAN

A mobile snow blower clears a walking path for students outside of Hamlin dormitory in Northeast late Monday afternoon. Snow removal continues to place a crunch on budgets both at UMass and across the Northeast.

By DENISE LAVOIE
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Backs aren't the only things hurting as residents of the Northeast shovel away mounds of snow left by the year's first blizzard. State and city budgets also are strained.

While the storm meant a pile of green for plow drivers, clearing away all the snow was a monumental headache for governments already wrestling with fiscal shortfalls. And the trouble isn't over. Rain expected this week, combined with melting snow, has several states bracing for flooding.

The storm, blamed for 58 deaths, finally headed out to sea after taking a parting shot at Boston, which got a record 27.5 inches by the time the snow stopped falling Tuesday morning.

Even though the storm was gone, many schools still remained closed Wednesday, including all Philadelphia public and parochial schools, because of snow-clogged and slippery streets and roads.

The storm cost Massachusetts between $7 million and $8 million in snow removal, bringing the state's total so far this year to at least $62 million. The state had budgeted only $16 million in fiscal 2003 for snow removal.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg estimated the storm would cost his city $20 million – about $1 million for each inch of snow. Maryland's State Highway Administration was already $14 million over budget before the President's Day storm, which Gov. Robert Ehrlich estimated had cost the state an additional $20 million to $30 million.

Baltimore-Washington National Airport got 28.2 inches, its highest on record, according to the National Weather Service. It was the fourth-heaviest on record for New York City – 19.8 inches in Central Park.

It could have been worse, some state officials said, coming as it did on a long holiday weekend when many businesses were closed.

"This has been one of those storms where things could go either way, and it's gone the right way every time for us," said Peter Judge, a spokesman for the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency. "It was sort of Murphy's law in reverse."

Twelve weather-related deaths were reported in Pennsylvania, with two in Illinois, eight in West Virginia, six in Missouri, two in Virginia, 11 in Maryland, four in New York, four in Iowa, two in New Jersey and one each in Nebraska, Ohio, Massachusetts and Connecticut. The Maryland victims included four children killed by carbon monoxide while sitting in snowbound vehicles.

Three people died in Tennessee, including a 7-year-old girl whose body was found Tuesday, two days after the car she was riding in was swept away by a flood. Her 12-year-old brother was still missing.

Authorities warned of the danger of roofs collapsing under the weight of snow. New Jersey's death was caused by a collapse and one person was injured in Massachusetts when a warehouse fell in. Thirteen poultry houses collapsed in West Virginia, killing about 325,000 chickens and turkeys.

White Sulphur Springs, W.Va., lost one of its Civic Center buildings, which held offices and exercise class space. "The walls buckled and the whole building was folding in on itself," said Mayor Debbie Fogus.

The storm that produced the heavy snow also brought heavy rain that caused weekend flooding in Tennessee, Kentucky, southern West Virginia and southwestern Virginia.

Residents of some areas braced for more flooding as the snow melts and more rain is likely later in the week. West Virginia Gov. Bob Wise put the National Guard on standby as a precaution, and said more than 200 families already had been affected by floods.

About an inch of rain could fall in Kentucky, said National Weather Service meteorologist Michael McEtame in Jackson, Ky. "With the ground already saturated, we can't rule out the possibility of some additional flood problems."

More than 250 travelers spent a third night stranded at Philadelphia International Airport while they waited for flights to return to normal. The airport supplied blankets and pillows.

Mickey Bucknam, 85, of Williamstown, N.J., had been stuck at Philadelphia International since Sunday. She and a cousin were trying to get to England to visit relatives.

"I never travel in the winter," Bucknam said. "and I'll never do it again."

Young recording artisits all hold a strong showing among the 45th Annual Grammy Award nominees energetic and soulful, but also a rare breed as she is a virtuoso musician vocally, instrumentally and as a songwriter.

Completing a trifecta of great female singer/songwriters is Vanessa Carlton. While Jones is based in jazz and Keys in R&B, Carlton's approach is more pop/rock based. Her debut album, "Be Not Nobody," lacked the consistent brilliance of Jones and Keys, but when she fired on target, like on "A Thousand Miles," "Rinse" and "Ordinary Day," the results were jaw-dropping. Carlton's considerable musicianship shines through in the craftsmanship and arrangements of her songs – the classically inspired, soaring, the string parts influenced by Rick Wakeman and her intricate, sophisticated voicing and harmonies. Her lyrics may seem silly and naive at times, and she is not as far ahead in her musical development as Jones and Keyes (too much borrowing from Tori Amos). Still, her musicianship and emotional impact show great things lie ahead.

John Mayer, 24, also has a ton of potential, but he's still trying to find his own, original style as the shadow of Dave Matthews looms over him. Mayer's songwriting, arranging and guitar playing are first-rate. He can write hooks that sink into you and never let go. His lyrics are wonderful observations of the trials and tribulations of being young, conveying an innocence that resonates with many young people. His tribute to women, "Your Body Is a Wonderland," is pure poetry. He will be a major force in the future.

Competing with Mayer as the king of young male singer/songwriters is Jason Mraz. His debut album was a little scattered, but his creative guitar-work, powerful voice and interesting wordplay show an artist oozing with potential.

We can't forget Fiona Apple, who is similar to Vanessa Carlton, but more advanced musically. She released her debut, "Tidal," when she was 18. Now at 25 years of age, her extraordinary performing talents and songwriting have grown. Like Carlton, her songs are rich with interesting harmonies and musical sophistication. But Apple is more seasoned in every respect, and her deeply personal songs are darker and more mysterious. Her jazzy piano dominates every song, and her cryptic lyrics are deeply indebted to Amos – conveying heartfelt, poetic expression. She is the kind of artist who may become too weird for mainstream tastes, yet will always have a deeply devoted following.

Then there are the teenagers: Avril Lavigne, 18, and Michelle Branch, 17. Both girls released debut albums that were good, yet not fully realized. Lavigne may be a little over-hyped, but there is no doubt that the girl is talented, particularly vocally. She has a dominating stage presence for her age. However, there is no way such a straight up pop-tune like "Complicated" should be competing for a writing award.

Michelle Branch has a strong vocal presence that blends innocence, passion, vulnerability, yearning, intensity and tenderness all in one voice, yet never ceases to be melodic. It is her lyrics that really stand out, providing insights into love that are remarkable for a 17-year-old. On "Drop in the Ocean" for instance, she manages to elevate the depiction of love to a spiritual level – a very rare occurrence in contemporary pop/rock.

Potential is everywhere you turn. The Strokes, whose members are 21 and 24, are revitalizing rock and roll by bringing back the mean, aggressive tone of 70s punk and 80s post-punk guitar rock. They have swagger and attitude, and the chops to back it up. The White Stripes are doing the same for garage rock. Starsailor is drawing comparisons to Radiohead and Coldplay in their native Britain, and their 21-year-old frontman James Walsh has the makings of a brilliant songwriter. Kenny Wayne Shepard, 25, and Jonny Lang, 22, continue to grow and electrify the blues world with their brilliant guitar playing.

Sadly shut out of the Grammy race was 21-year-old vocal sensation Josh Groban. With his impeccable, stunning baritone voice, Groban achieved great pop/classical success, selling three million copies of his debut album. The refreshingly low-key and humble Groban is the kind of young virtuoso that comes along once or twice a generation; he has superstardom written all over. It would be great, however, to see him put out an album in the future that really challenges his voice, rather than merely showcasing it.

Love or hate her, no one can doubt the vocal talent of Christina Aguilera. Since she burst onto the scene four years ago, capturing the Grammy for Best New Artist, her erratic behavior has often taken the focus away from her awesome pipes. Aguilera, 22, showed lots of growth as a singer and artist with "Stripped," and she will, barring any major Mariah Carey-like breakdowns, only continue to get better. Anyone who criticizes her for being able to do nothing but lighweight pop need only listen to her scorching rendition of Etta James' "At Last" to see differently. It would be nice, like with Groban, to see Aguilera do an album in the future where she completely challenges herself.

A group of young, talented musicians of this number hasn't emerged this quickly in recent memory. The scariest part is to think of how good they will be ten years from now – as they continue to hone their skills and develop as musicians (that is assuming none of them suddenly disappear off the musical map). As music fans in the same age group as these fantastic rising stars, we students will have the privilege of watching them grow as we grow, as they provide us with great music throughout our lives.

Christina Aguilera is up for a Grammy for her duet with Redman.

One of our job requirements includes "being yourself."

Frozen treats in your yard

Micrology
Jessica Pelletier

Greetings readers. Mid-February has arrived, and apparently Mother Nature is squatting her ugly rump right on our laps and refusing to budge until at least the end of March, so we may as well get used to it. By now we've all been shoveled out of the god-forsaken precipitation that has become so large a part of the New England lifestyle. So, if sliding and baby stepping your way to classes has you in a mood to burn your notebooks for warmth and run away on the first plane bound for Antigua, do me a favor and eat it. Yes, eat it. This week's column is dedicated to frozen drinks, snow cones, maple syrup candy and other delicious ways to use the sub-zero mess dumped on our lawns.

SNOW CONES – 6 uniformly shaped baseball-size balls of clean snow | 1 cup each Midori, Hot Damn and Blue Curacao liquor, or 1 cup each cherry juice, grape Kool aide and orange Hi-C | 6, 6 oz. plastic cups

I think you know how to assemble these things without any instruction. If using freshly fallen snow seems too icky for you, you've probably strayed too far from childhood. So shave some ice in a blender while you ponder your inability to enjoy the innocent, childlike pleasure in catching snowflakes on your tongue you sad, sad person.

SUGAR ON SNOW – 1 8-inch pie pan packed with clean snow | 2 cups pure maple syrup | 12 unused Popsicle sticks | 1 cooking thermometer | 12 sour pickles and plain doughnuts

This sweet taffy has been a tradition in New England and Canada for over 200 years. It's also the best way to keep yourself awake until way past Conan O'Brien when you should be doing more productive things like sleeping. Anyhow, begin by heating the maple syrup to around 234 degrees Fahrenheit, while overcooking will result in chewier taffy. When the syrup reaches the right temperature, do not stir it, just pour it over the snow and let it harden for a minute and wrap the candy around the Popsicle sticks. Usually, a good plain doughnut will keep you from going into sugar shock, and in between servings of sour pickles are eaten to cut the sweetness.

DIRTY SNOW MILK SHAKE – 7 cups fresh snow (yes, clean) | 3 cups chocolate milk | 6 crushed double stuffed Oreos | 1 1/4 tsp. Mint extract | 3 cups sugar

Yes, this drink is another no-brainer. Pour milk, Oreos, mint and sugar over the snow and cover the container with a leak proof lid. Shake like a crazy person, and store the remaining beverage in the refrigerator. But you may as well drink as much as possible, cause the second that snow melts, you're going to be left with a watered down frappe with soggy cookie sediment on the bottom.

Will any of this make you feel better about being trapped inside your house or having your car covered in snow? Probably not, but enough of the spiked snow cones will make anything copasetic. The point is that although we've drifted away from the days when a snowstorm was a gift that got you out of third grade math, we can still take time to appreciate the winter while it's here.

Crossing cultures: the Afro-Semetic Experience

The Afro-Semetic Experience, featuring pianist Warren Byrd and bassist David Chevan, will bring its music and cultural messages to the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 7:30.

By ALLISON LESHEFSKY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Afro-Semitic Experience, featuring pianist Warren Byrd and bassist David Chevan, will perform in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 7:30 p.m. This jazz band stresses the cultural and musical heritage of the Jewish and African diaspora and produces music of Eastern European Klezmer and South African peace songs, gospel, blues, hip-hop and classic jazz.

"Bringing the band to UMass helps build positive coalitions among the many cultures, religions and ethnicities on campus," said Susan Moser, the Assistant Director of UMass Hillel. "Students from various student groups are collaborating on the project, creating an opportunity for increased understanding and appreciation of each other."

The Afro-Semitic Experience began performing in late 1999, expanding the Jewish-American and African-American musical dialogue that Byrd and Chevan had begun a few years earlier. Through its art, the Afro-Semitic Experience brings the two communities together in celebration, acknowledging their shared experiences as well as their differences.

"It is a sign of the times in some places, where neither Jews nor blacks were welcome," wrote Ken Franckling of United Press International, "Yet the two groups have a shared history of ancestral struggles, civil rights battles and oppression and violence at the hands of the narrow-minded that continue off and on today."

Daniel Koroma of the African Graduate Students and Scholars Association shared similar thoughts. "It's all about people trying to come together and forget about all of the things that divide society," he said. Born in Sierra Leone, West Africa, Koroma sees this event as an expression of one community trying to live in harmony. He added that he is impressed with the process of inclusion that the Jewish community has been striving for.

Additional opportunities for cross cultural exchange and learning were held prior to the event, including a women's multicultural cooking extravaganza on Wednesday in the Hatch kitchen, where students from the various co-sponsoring organizations prepared traditional ethnic foods for the post concert reception while sharing stories about the food culture in their respective traditions.

More events, however, are planned to follow. Within the next few weeks, the event students plan to meet for a Crossing Cultures II Coffeehouse, where students from the co-sponsoring organizations will be able to engage in discussion, text study and an exchange of ideas and experiences.

Crossing Cultures: The Afro-Semitic Experience begins tonight and is free and open to the public.

Seniors ski in final regular season meet

By ARI JANKELOWITZ
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

HENNIKER, N.H. – The tears welled up in senior Mollie Lyon's eyes as it became clear who would be announced as the women's individual champion. No, it was not Lyon, the Massachusetts captain, an excellent skier in her own right, finishing 17th overall, but teammate and classmate Carolyn Lewenberg.

Capping an exciting day at the St. Anselm Carnival at Pat's Peak in Henniker, N.H., Lewenberg won her last regulation race as a Minutewoman and had also apparently captured the MacConnel Conference regular season individual championship, in what one coach called, "The strongest group of skiers in 16 years."

Because of the way the championship is computed, the announcement became a comedy of errors. The computation goes as follows: the winner of the regular season is determined by the number of points one has accumulated during the season with the lowest two scores dropped. But the official announced the total points and did not drop the lowest two. Thus, all the places were wrong, and Lewenbug ended up finishing third overall.

Beau Gibson's place was also wrong. Originally, the official read fourth place, and after careful deliberation, the correction had Gibson finishing second overall.

One thing the officials did not mess up was the team overall standings. The women did in fact win the league, with the men finishing third.

"[It's] a good way to finish up senior year," said Lewenberg, on finishing first in the race and also on her third-place showing for the season.

Lyon finished on good terms as well, as she came in with a top 10 showing in the slalom. The Minutewomen sustained a costly DNF (did not finish) from sophomore Nikki Smith, who complained of migraines before not finishing the second run of the slalom race, leaving her to finish third.

The men had a more harrowing day than they have been accustomed to this year. The fourth-place finish in the slalom gave them enough total season points for an overall third-place finish for the year.

Senior Jay Robbins put on a strong showing in the first run of the slalom, but bowed out during the second run. While he would not comment on the slalom race, he shared some insight on his four years at UMass.

"[UMass skiing] took an OK skier like myself and made me a competitive racer," Robbins said. "The team progressed over the last four years. Coach Vanovac's background as a competitive skier really helped."

Robbins wasn't the only senior to lend some insight. "[It was] the best year we've had," said Lyon, the women's senior captain. "The whole week was so much fun, and with Igor's heart in it 110 percent, we want to perform our best."

Senior Chris Pomeroy, who finished in the top 20 overall in the regular season rankings, was all business about the end of the season.

"The real season just started," he said. "The Eastern Regionals is where it counts."

The Eastern Regionals will be held at Waterville Valley on Feb. 22-23.

Junior Beau Gibson, one of the best skiers in the MacConnel Conference, finished in the top five of the regular season rankings, yet declined to comment on this past weekend's race.

Gibson finished in second place in the slalom. Joining Gibson as qualifiers for the race were John Gray, junior David Pomeroy, who finished in the top 10, and freshmen Patrick Bachant and Nick Nacca.

Nacca's time, originally disqualified because of his straddling the gate, was allowed. After a careful review, it was found he had in fact not straddled the gate. Instead, his ski had ridden over it. When the Carnival officials could not find tracks on the other side of the gate to prove he had straddled the gate, the time was allowed, helping UMass to second place.

At hand for the race was long time Assistant Athletic Director Al Rufe.

"[I'm] proud of the whole team," said Rufe, who is coming into his 53th year with the University. "The women finished first [overall], Carolyn [was] the overall winner, Beau [was] in the top five and the men finished third overall. The whole athletic department is proud of them."

Unfortunately for Rufe and all of UMass, the individual champion was not Lewenberg, but was instead Lori Williams from Boston College.

Being the last collegiate race for many senior skiers, some dressed in mildly amusing outfits. Wally Neuemberg from UConn dressed in an open chest body-suit, and his teammate Tim Embery showed up clad in Superman attire (cape and tights included).

They were outdone by the classy boxers-covered-by-a-giant-diaper outfit worn by Corey Felton of Colby-Sawyer. Felton did not finish the second run and eventually fell on the cold snow after attempting to stop.

"The women winning really showed how the dedication for training and practicing has paid off," Vanovac said. "Assistant Coach Mike Leblanc did a good job this season of relaxing the skiers before a race. That is critical because of how demanding I am on the skiers during training."

The men and women's ski teams have brought much respect and success to the UMass reputation by respectively finishing third and first overall in the MacConnel Conference this season.

The season was summed best by Lyon.

"[We] had a lot of fun, skied fast," she said.

Having a monochromatic arena for athletic contests had been a common occurrence in previous years for hockey, and for this season's men's basketball team. Of course, the only promotion being run at those games was "Maroon Out the Mullins."

And as many visiting players will tell you, having a row of empty seat-backs is never quite as intimidating as multiple sections of similarly-dressed fans screaming unpleasantries your way. That's exactly the kind of atmosphere the Minutemen hope to see Friday night.

"You definitely want a big crowd there; you always want your students there to support you," senior captain Jim Turner said. "The better the atmosphere, the more excited you are to play."

As if the Minutemen had any more reason to get pumped for the weekend, Friday night's game will also be televised on Fox Sports New England as its "Hockey East Game of the Week." The broadcast marks the first time the network has made the journey west to showcase a UMass home game.

Normally, FSNE decides to stay in its home Boston region for its telecast, unless an enticing matchup presents itself (i.e. New Hampshire-Maine on Feb. 2). Still, with more people taking notice of this UMass team, along with the No. 3 team in the nation coming to Amherst, the decision should have been a no-brainer.

It's a way to expose our team and a way for more people across the state to see us play. I've got friends in Chicago who are going to watch the game, and people back home are going to watch the game too," Turner said.

But those able to make it to the Mullins Center on Friday can expect to see an attendance approaching the season-high 6,286 achieved two weeks ago against BU. With a big, loud crowd and a nationally televised game, what else could be used for motivation?

How about four potentially critical Hockey East points?

"I guess you have to get fired up either way," sophomore Greg Mauldin said. "We have the last three regular season games coming up, and they're pretty big."

True, the 500 had been rain-shortened before. Twice. But both of those races had gone far longer and the viewing audience was microscopic compared to the 9.8 rating the Fox-televised race received this year. And the rain was a likely cause for the drop from last year's rating of 10.8 on NBC.

During the rain delay, Fox's Jeff Hammond sat down with four drivers – Rusty Wallace, Jeff Gordon, Earnhardt Jr. and Kurt Busch – to discuss the status of the sport. They touched on all kinds of topics, one of which was how to handle the rain, should it hit Daytona. The drivers were unanimous — plan the races for Saturday night all over the tour. It makes for an easier week, a greater viewing audience, and should the rain hit, it gives an extra day to get the race in before the next week's event.

It's better for the drivers, the fans and, well, everyone that way, so why would NASCAR not do it?

My guess is that the tradition of the sport being on Sunday will hold back Helton and co. from making such a "brash" decision. They will likely talk about how identified NASCAR is with Sunday afternoons and how fans will run away from the sport, when the truth is, the only thing that can happen is growth.

The end of the season is dwarfed by football, and the last few races are all but invisible to those who aren't die-hard fans. The die-hards will watch whenever the race is run, but there is a greater untouched audience available for Saturday nights, when the race wouldn't lose out to what is considered the country's true Sunday tradition.

It's time for Helton and his good ol' boys to make a smart decision. It's just a shame that it took the mockery of such a respected race to push them toward that decision.

Ebony Pegues and the Minutewomen will spend the weekend in the City of Brotherly Love for games with St. Joseph's and Temple.

UMass heads to Philadelphia

[illegible]

a young team that boasts only three four-year players on their roster. They're led by a trio of junior scorers – guard Erin Brady, forward Stephanie Graff and most notably, 6-foot-5 center Irina Krasnoshiuk, and her 15.1 points per game. The latter seems to pose a rather large challenge for Butler and the Minutewoman front line.

"Their center is big and physical," Butler said. "She's taller than me, and she gets a lot of touches, so it's up to me to step up and help control her if we want to be successful.

"In the end though, it comes down to how well we play and execute as a team and how well they do the same," she continued. "We can't let it become a battle of individuals."

Another difficult challenge that goes hand-in-hand with a trip to Philadelphia is the not-so-inviting task of playing on "Hawk Hill," home of one of the A-10's best home-court advantages. Although not quite as vicious as it is known to be for men's games, the impact of the St. Joe's faithful is not lost on Dacko.

"It's definitely a tough place to play," she said. "Obviously, we're not used to playing before large crowds on a regular basis, but even if there isn't one tomorrow night, that place has the ability to make even a small crowd seem large and intimidating.

"It's definitely a challenge we need to overcome."

Thursday night's game tips off at 7 p.m. at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse on the campus of St. Joseph's.

A playoff atmosphere

Vital series for Mass Attack

By MATT BRADY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's playoff time.

True, the Hockey East postseason won't officially start for another two weeks, but with third-ranked Maine coming to the Mullins Center for a pair against the Massachusetts hockey team, every game from here on in is truly a playoff game.

"The way we have to look at this is this is our playoffs," freshman defenseman Marvin Degon said. "If we don't do well these last three games, we could end up being a lower seed. We've clinched the playoffs, but that's like, 'Oh great, we're in the playoffs. We want to do more than that.'"

"It's pretty much a playoff series," sophomore Greg Mauldin said. "Having them at our place twice, you know if you're going to the playoffs, you're going to face a good team – no team's going to be a pushover."

The Minutemen have squared off against the Black Bears (22-5-3, 12-4-1 HE) twice this season – a 1-0 loss at Alfond Arena on Nov. 9 and an 8-5 drubbing in the finals of the Five Blades College Classic on Dec. 28.

"I think we've learned a little [from playing them twice]," coach Don Cahoon said. "Certainly in Florida we learned how you can't play and sit, and against them, so we need to work really hard to make sure that we don't let that occur."

But as Degon points out, both those games were in entirely different conditions.

"It's different settings," he said. "One game was at Alfond, and that's a pretty serious environment. The other time was in Florida, and that's a different rink, a different size rink, and then you come here and it's a completely different rink."

The Minutemen will likely get to see the return of sophomore Tim Vitek, who has missed the last four games with an injury. According to Cahoon, Vitek will likely play alongside physical freshmen Peter Alden and Steve Iacobs, who performed well against Connecticut.

Defusing Maine's speed will be quite a challenge for the Maroon and White, as the Black Bears skate four lines that top to bottom may be the fastest in the conference.

"We'll hopefully try to key on Kariya," Mauldin said. "He's a quick player, [and we're focusing on] not letting him get too much skating through the neutral zone, taking away their speed by controlling our gaps and holding off guys really well. And hopefully we'll score goals off their mistakes, because they're human too, and make the same mistakes as anyone else."

The Maroon and White is coming off a somewhat unimpressive win over UConn, 8-6, where the Minutemen came within minutes of becoming the first Hockey East team to lose to a Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference squad.

"It was a win," said Degon, who posted a career-high four points in the victory. "And we haven't had many lately. It's always good to come from behind. A win is a win, whether it's by 20 goals or by one goal."

The Minutemen (15-13-1, 8-7-0 HE) have only a game on the road against Merrimack after this weekend's contests, and trail the Warriors for sixth place in the conference by one point. Merrimack has games remaining against the two conference

Thomas Peck and the Massachusetts hockey team will host a pair of games against No. 3 Maine this weekend.

Women reach pivotal stretch

By MIKE MARZELLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One game does not a season make.

This is an old sports proverb designed to take a team's focus off of the importance of one single contest. Yet after sprinting out to an 8-1 start, the Massachusetts women's basketball team may find it prophetic as it limps into Philadelphia tonight on the heels of a 4-10 stretch to play St. Joseph's (14-9, 9-3 Atlantic 10). It is the first of three consecutive crucial matchups with East division contenders, any of which could, in fact, make or break its season.

"Obviously, this stretch is going to define our season, starting with tonight," senior co-captain Jennifer Butler said. "[St. Joe's] leads our division, but we know we can play with anyone. So if we want to be the best, we have to beat the best."

The Hawks are the second division leader the Minutewomen will face in the course of a week, having fallen to George Washington 63-59 in overtime last Thursday. However, after winning four consecutive games, St. Joe's has dropped two in a row, and a battered and bruised UMass squad will hope to exploit the Hawks' recent woes.

"They're tough, but they're also on a bit of a downslide," coach Marmie Dacko said. "They've lost a couple in a row, and we're obviously a bit beat up, so hopefully we can come together as a team and take one from them.

"I know we have the talent and the ability to win," she added. "Even with the injuries, it's just a matter of going out there and doing it. We need to stay aggressive and play with a passion and we will put ourselves in position to win."

Injuries do continue to be a problem for Coach Dacko's squad. In addition to playing without starting point guard Katie Nelson, who has been out for two weeks, Dacko must again find a replacement for another starting guard, junior Cleo Foster. Freshman reserve Cindy Gonzalez is also nursing injuries and is considered day-to-day.

"I told Cleo to hold off until the tournament," Dacko said. "Obviously, it's a setback not having her in there, but hopefully it'll help her get back to where she needs to be healthy-wise."

Unlike the senior-laden Minutewomen, the Hawks are

Daytona must have true end

Matt Brady

Picture it. Middle of the third quarter in the Super Bowl. The rain is coming down in sheets. Suddenly, the officials run onto the field and call the game due to inclement conditions. The team ahead at that point is declared the winner, and a joint celebration ensues.

But for the fans, it just sucks.

That's how everyone watching the Daytona 500 this weekend felt. Lied. Robbed. Just plain snookered. When officials decided to call the race after 109 of the 200 laps were complete, Michael Waltrip ran onto the infield for what was the most bizarre celebration in the history of motor sports.

No victory lap. No waving out the window. This even made the anti-climactic finishes under a yellow flag seem more fully normal. Ending the race just over halfway through? With the cars under tarps? Talk about sacrilegious.

I am happy for Waltrip. As a longtime fan of the late Dale Earnhardt, it was nice to see the elder statesman of DEI's team win in a situation where he could actually celebrate. But it will never make up for the empty feeling in my stomach left from the third Sunday of February.

So many questions were left to answer. Could Dale Jr. get a lap back and make a charge at the lead, considering he had the fastest car in the race? Would the Richard Childress cars, that worked hand-in-hand with DEI in testing, be able to overtake the kings of restrictor plate racing? Could Tony Stewart win the opening stop on his Winston Cup champion tour after making the switch to Chevy?

Those questions went unanswered in this year's Daytona 274. Two hundred twenty-six miles away from the true finish line, the race was decided.

Of course, safety is the primary concern of NASCAR chief Mike Helton. The sport has been under incredibly close scrutiny over the past couple of years with the passing of the sport's greatest star at its most famous track. Placing the safety of his drivers over the money associated with the sport's fans is a commendable decision.

But still, the finish of the race could have been put off until the following day, worst case scenario. If the race had been fewer than 100 laps in, the finish would have been put off until the following day. Why not just make the race go the full length by finishing 24 hours later?

Daytona should not get special treatment because of its history or because it is the premiere event in the fastest growing sport in America. Rather, NASCAR directors should institute a policy to ensure that every race goes its full distance whenever possible. Obviously, three days of rain is more than enough to kill a race, but unless that situation is present, an event should go to its true end. This is not only a good decision for the fans but for the sport as well, as it is just gaining a large chunk of the national attention. To have one of the oldest traditions in motor sports ruined out so far short of the finish is just plain bad for the growth of the sport.

Lowly Dukes pose threat

Could cause a UMass letdown

By JIM PIGNATELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has been prone to letdown games this season. Earlier in the year anytime the Minutemen (10-14, 4-7 Atlantic 10) looked like they were finally starting to turn things around, they would lose to a lesser team.

It happened when UMass snapped a three-game winning streak – including a win over then-No. 24 North Carolina State – with a loss in its first A-10 game of the season at Fordham. The Rams, by the way, sit just 2-20, with their lone win in conference coming over the Minutemen.

This game after letdowns to lowly Central Connecticut State and Lafayette – by a total of three points.

Not to harp on the "what ifs," but UMass would be 13-11 right now and eyeing a National Invitational Tournament berth if it could get those games back.

But in the basketball world of living and learning, the Minutemen have to show they have realized something through these upsets, and Sunday is the perfect setting for them to exhibit that what coach Steve Lappas has been preaching is finally getting through.

Riding a two-game winning streak over a pair of tough opponents, Richmond and Saint Bonaventure, the Maroon and White will take on another potential spoiler at the Mullins Center this weekend in Duquesne (8-16, 2-9 A-10). One of the Dukes' wins is over Fordham.

It isn't just the letdown factor that worries Lappas, however. His team doesn't match up as favorably with Duquesne as it did with Richmond and St. Bonaventure.

"The big problem for us is they are a big team," said UMass coach Steve Lappas, whose team has beaten the Spiders and Bonnies, two of the A-10's smaller teams. "That does provide some difficulty for us."

UMass out-rebounded its opponents by six in its two victories, but hasn't performed as well against larger frontcourts.

"We've struggled on the glass against bigger teams," said Lappas, whose team was manhandled underneath in its last loss, a 61-50 defeat at the hands of Temple. The bigger, stronger Owls out-rebounded the Minutemen 44-26 in that contest.

After playing a smaller lineup against the Bonnies last weekend, which included starting 6-foot-6 Raheim Lamb as power forward, Lappas will return to his natural, bigger lineup on Sunday.

"We need [center] Gabe Lee and [power forward] Jackie Rogers to step up," Lappas said. "We'll be starting those two guys again."

The change for the Bonnies game was also a result of Lee feeling ill and missing practices that led up to the battle in Olean, N.Y. But the 6-foot-9 Camilla, Ga. native should be back in the maroon and white Sunday.

Gabe should be healthy," Lappas said.

Despite a regular size advantage, the Dukes haven't exactly been throwing centers and power forwards around in the paint. In fact, they are averaging minus-2.3 rebounding margin per game.

The Dukes do have some talent, especially around the perimeter, but much of it comes in the form of new faces – faces that haven't been able to contain.

"[Duquesne] is a brand new team," Lappas said. "They've struggled to find their identity."

Perimeter players Kevin Forney and Jimmy Tricco, who average 17.5 and 11 points per game, respectively, lead the Dukes. The duo has combined to go 76-for-196 (43 percent) from the 3-point line.

"We have to do a good job guarding the perimeter," Lappas said. "That's something we've been good at [all year]."

Junior Ron Dukes clogs up the middle to the tune of 10 points, five rebounds and one block per game, while classmate Elijah Palmer chips in nine, five and 1.5.

Tricco, Dukes and Palmer are all transfers playing in their first year with Duquesne.

As for UMass, point guard Anthony Anderson's play has been the highlight of the past three games. The reigning A-10 Rookie of the Year got off to a rough start, but has started to show the chops that earned him a preseason All-Conference Third Team selection heading into the season.

"I think he's playing now the way we expected the entire season," Lappas said.

Anderson has averaged 17.6 points per game in the past three contests, upping his average to 10.9 for the season.

Against St. Bonaventure, Anderson scored 19 points on 5-for-8 shooting (4-for-7 behind the arc) while dishing out seven assists and committing just three turnovers against the best defensive player in the A-10, Marques Green.

Have the Minutemen begun to turn it around? Are the messages getting across? Sunday's game will be a big help in answering these questions.

Five College Festival

Second annual outdoor festival kicked off

World renowned ski champ Jan Reynolds speaks with her audience about her outdoor adventures and encounters with indigenous cultures at Mt. Holyoke College.

By BONNIE OBREMSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The second Annual Five-College Outdoor Festival kicked off at Mount Holyoke Tuesday evening when world-renowned ski champ Jan Reynolds spoke to an audience about a journey to a culture that had not seen a U.S. citizen in 48 years.

She traveled to China on the heels of Nixon in 1973 with the sponsorship of both Ski Magazine and National Geographic.

Reynolds' multimedia performance captivated everyone in the darkened classroom while she narrated breathtaking photographs with tales of the indigenous Chinese culture and her adventures on the Pamirs Mountains.

"You were an inspiration back then," said one audience member, a teacher at St. Peter Marion High School in Worcester, who handed over a pile of yellowed magazines for Reynolds to sign.

Skiers were not the only ones represented at the festival, as kayakers played a part as well.

"Do you have riversense?" said Kate Geis to whitewater kayakers across North America in her latest documentary, screened at Smith College on Wednesday night. Students and whitewater enthusiasts traveled from the corners of the Valley to view the best-of-the-best surf the gnarliest stretches of river in the country.

"The people of the outdoors and the whitewater lifestyle are very appealing to me," Geis said. "People may have egos but there is always an underlying part of them that is humbled by the power of whitewater."

Brett Davis, who operates the Multi-Sport Center at Hampshire, in addition to instructing white-water kayaking, initiated the Five-College Outdoor Festival last year. Through Davis' "Event Creation and Management" course, Hampshire students Brad Beggs and Jason Kamin and UMass graduate Jason Giguere helped in coordinating each part of the festival.

Scott Johnson, director of Smith's Outdoor Program, Betsy Swanner, president of Mount Holyoke's Outing Club and Cam Millard of Amherst's Outing Club also provided assistance in pulling the Five-College community together for this event.

Despite enthusiastic participation and the success of the Outdoor Festival, it is uncertain whether the festival will survive another year. Davis will be leaving Hampshire in the spring, and the task of organizing the event will fall on the shoulders of students and faculty who wish to continue the organizational process.

"In terms of Hampshire and the Five Colleges, the festival is a good outreach for people to visit our school and participate in some pretty cool activities," Davis said. "There's a lot that's gone on behind the scenes in terms of securing sponsorship and getting contracts with speakers."

Davis believes that for the festival to continue, student involvement will have to be accompanied by the instruction of an advisor.

Differences from last year's festival included increased participation from Mount Holyoke, Smith and Amherst Colleges. Also, children under 18 will not be able to participate in the climbing competition taking place on Saturday afternoon. According to student organizer Bradley Beggs, "this will give the older people a chance to win."

FRIDAY, FEB. 21 SCHEDULE OF EVENTS AT AMHERST COLLEGE:

7 p.m.: Cole Assembly Room: Photographer and climber Tim Kemple: Slide show on climbing in New England.

8:30 p.m.: Mark Synott of Team North Face will recount his expedition in Tibet, where he made nine first ascents and explored Tibetan Buddhist culture.

SATURDAY, FEB. 22 SCHEDULE OF EVENTS AT HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE:

1:30-5 p.m.: Climbing competition

9 a.m.-5 p.m.: Zoar Outdoor kayak instruction in the pool. See latest kayak designs from Dagger, Wave Sport, Perception and others. Bring a swimsuit.

7 p.m.: Franklin Patterson Hall Telluride Mountain Film Festival. Free for Five College students, faculty and staff with college ID. Tickets for the public are $10.

Daily Jolt site is rejuvenated

By Hirak Shah
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Finding out what's going on in the Five-College area has just become easier.

The Daily Jolt, at http://uofma.dailyjolt.com/, is a student-run web page that contains information on what is going on both at UMass and off campus as well. The site is based on a website called Amherst Central, which was created by several Amherst College students.

The Daily Jolt is specific to each college, but the basic format of the website is the same. Presently, there is a Daily Jolt website for 97 colleges. For any school that does not have a Daily Jolt website, there is a link to help the school start one.

On the University of Massachusetts campus, the Daily Jolt is a very extensive website. Students are able to find out about parties and other activities like info sessions and movies that will be playing on campus. In addition, students can also find out what is happening in the Five-College area at Amherst, Hampshire, Smith, and Mount Holyoke.

Listings are not the only thing this website has to offer. Students can also find out about the weather and add messages to an online message board that people can respond to.

There are also links to the different departments' web pages at UMass and to the financial aid website, library and OIT. There are links to fun stuff like UMass student web sites, sites for UMass organizations and the "rate the professor" web page. There is also a horoscope page and a procrastination page, leading to other sites.

The Jolt has the latest information from on campus and links to campus newspapers and other newspapers such as the Boston Globe and Boston Herald.

Memorable quotes by professors can be submitted to the Daily Jolt and could end up on the UMass professors' quotes part of the site. There are other academic links to OWL, and posted hours for the computer labs, dining commons, gyms, pools and the library.

One of the focal points of the website is the food section. There are menus for many of the local area eateries and reviews of most of these places.

A couple of unique things on this website are called ride boards. Students must first register with the Daily Jolt, and then can submit a request for a ride. The request must include the destination and the start date to the end date. The student's name is then posted on the request a ride board. People can contact the student to offer him or her a ride. If someone wants to give a student a ride he or she can click on the offer a ride link, and a message will be sent to the student that is being offered a ride.

The Daily Jolt has a marketplace board on its website where students can list the object(s) they want to sell. Students can sell anything from textbooks to fridges to video games. Students who click on the new topic link can post there what they want to sell, and it will appear instantly on the marketplace board. If a student wants to sell or buy a textbook the old-fashioned way, the Daily Jolt has a partnership with textbooks.com, where students can sell and buy textbooks.

Another useful attribute of this web site is the job listings page. A person can either respond to an ad or post a job listing that he or she needs filled. There are many different parts to the page from on campus/local jobs, to summer internships, as well as full-time employment.

Moreover, the Daily Jolt offers movie listings as well as TV listings. There is an events calendar and the menu of the food that will be served at the dining commons. The bus schedules for all the PVTA buses are also listed, as is the UMass phone book.

The Daily Jolt is a really innovative website even though it has Terrorist threat does not change lives at UMass

By SHAWN SPARKS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

University of Massachusetts students are aware of the recently elevated threat of terrorism, but are generally not taking the government recommended precautions such as buying duct tape, plastic sheeting or bottled water.

On Feb. 7, the terrorist threat condition was bumped up to code orange by the Bush administration, indicating a high level of possible terrorist threats. Officials issued suggestions for Americans to protect their families, ranging from buying duct tape and plastic sheeting to sealing off rooms from chemical agents to stockpiling bottled water.

Students returning from outside Massachusetts after the long weekend reported high levels of concern in some areas.

Denise Nunez, a UMass sophomore, said that in Manhattan people were wary of taking the subway, especially during rush hour.

"People are so crazed in Manhattan, buying as much duct tape as they can," said Jeffery Gillis, a Manhattan resident.

According to a recent ABC poll, Americans' concerns of a direct threat are much lower in less densely populated areas than in bigger metropolitan areas.

At UMass, some students are feeling immune to attack, while others sense the threat, but are taking little action.

"Yeah, I heard about it, but I have not taken any extra precautions," said Matthew Connelly, a UMass sophomore from Hingham.

"I know it's out there, but I don't incorporate it into my daily living. Maybe I should though," said Laurel Silkey, a UMass junior from Westfield.

When asked her thoughts on the threats, Jihan Hadri, 20, said, "The government feels they have to give Americans a security blanket so they can tell them 'I told you so' if anything were to happen."

"It's the government's plan to keep us scared," added junior Manny Matos.

But there does appear to be some level of concern lately. Around town, stores including Wal-Mart and Rocky's Ace Hardware are reporting that duct tape and plastic sheeting are selling fast.

Resolution to be presented Monday

By BARRY SCHWEID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration and its closest ally, Britain, are planning to present a new resolution to the U.N. Security Council on Monday in a bid for support to use force to disarm Iraq.

Finishing touches were being put on the resolution on Thursday. Adoption is by no means assured. A majority of the 15 council members are opposed to war at least until U.N. weapons inspectors report in mid-March.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said a headcount was "academic" because the resolution demanding Iraqi disarmament had not been put forward.

Powell, who is due to fly to Japan on Friday for the start of a five-day Asia trip, juggled resolution diplomacy with stressful negotiations with Turkey, a potential key ally in any war.

Turkey is balking at U.S. terms for an economic aid package. Powell, who interceded on Wednesday with Prime Minister Abdullah Gul, said he had told the Turkish leader "our position was firm with respect to the kind of assistance we could provide."

However, Powell said, "there may be some other creative things we can do."

As for the expected U.N. resolution, the Bush administration sees little value in extending inspections and much to worry about in Iraq's connection to al-Qaida and other terror groups.

One U.S. official said the projected date for presenting the resolution was Monday but that it could slip a day or two.

Powell said, "We won't put a resolution down unless we intend to fight for the resolution, unless we believe we can make the case that it is appropriate."

In Baghdad, meanwhile, Iraq allowed another flight by an American U-2 surveillance plane Thursday as President Saddam Hussein's government sought to convince the world that it is cooperating with the weapons inspectors.

In New York, a U.N. spokesman said Iraq also had submitted a list of people involved in the destruction of banned weapons – a key demand by chief weapons inspector Hans Blix.

It was the second flight this week by a U-2 in support of the U.N. inspection program. The Iraqi Foreign Ministry said the plane spent six hours and 20 minutes over Iraq's territory, searching for evidence of banned weapons.

In regard to the possible basing of U.S. troops in Turkey, Gul said in Ankara that a statement would be made on Friday. He did not elaborate.

Powell did not elaborate on the refinements under consideration, but another U.S. official said one

Citizens worried by low international support

By WILL LESTER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – A solid majority of Americans support military action against Iraq, but the concern that the United States doesn't have enough international support for such military action is growing, says a new poll.

Nearly six in 10 Americans, 57 percent, say the United States should get a second U.N. resolution before attacking Iraq, and about the same number, 58 percent, say this country does not currently have enough international support for such an attack. These are the findings of a poll released Thursday by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Pew Research Center Director Andrew Kohut said the most important findings of the poll are that the debate with longtime allies in the United Nations, the report by U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix and overseas peace protests "have affected public opinion."

"The number of people who are basically backing support hasn't changed," Kohut said, "but concerns about the big qualification of international support have."

General support for military action against Iraq was at 66 percent, but that tends to drop in polls when people are asked about attacking without allied backing. Polls show a majority approves of military action as long as this country has the support of major allies.

But recent events are raising public concerns about the need for international backing. The Pew poll found public sentiment shifting significantly between early February and after the United Nations heard from weapons inspector Blix.

The poll found that public opinion shifted away from quick military action on several questions. Those include whether the United States has enough international support, whether Iraq will disarm peacefully and whether U.N. inspectors have found proof that Iraq is hiding weapons of mass destruction.

Kohut said the poll suggests that failing to get backing from the United Nations and a broad alliance before attacking could mean the war effort would not have as much widespread public support in this country in the long run.

Six in 10 said they believe the weapons inspection efforts showed that Iraq will not cooperate and cannot be peacefully disarmed. But the number of people who believe Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had any connection with terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 dropped from 66 percent in October to 57 percent now.

The Pew poll of 1,254 adults conducted with the Council on Foreign Relations was conducted in waves Feb. 12-13 and Feb. 14-18. It has an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points, slightly larger for subgroups.

Professor charged in terrorist case

By CURT ANDERSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – A Florida computer engineering professor and seven other men were charged Thursday with overseeing and financing the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group, which has been blamed for killing more than 100 people in Israel and adjacent territories.

The University of South Florida professor, 45-year-old Sami Amin Al-Arian, and three other U.S. residents were arrested after the 50-count indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla. The indictment describes Al-Arian as the Islamic Jihad's U.S. leader, head of a terrorist cell in Tampa and secretary of the group's worldwide council.

Attorney General John Ashcroft said the indictment sends a message: "We will hunt down the suppliers of terrorist money, we will shut down their sources and we will ensure that both terrorists and their financiers meet the same swift, certain justice of the United States of America."

Shortly after his arrest in Tampa, Al-Arian told reporters, "It's all about politics." On forced leave from the university, he has publicly rejected the idea that he has ties to terrorism.

His attorney, Nicholas Matassini, said after a preliminary court hearing, "He's a political prisoner right now as we speak." The attorney denounced the indictment as "a work of fiction."

The indictment accuses the eight men of operating a criminal racketeering enterprise since 1984 supporting Palestinian Islamic Jihad and with conspiracy to kill and maim people abroad, conspiracy to provide material support to the group, extortion, visa fraud, perjury and other charges. Each defendant could face life in prison if convicted.

Al-Arian and two others were arrested in Tampa and a fourth man was arrested in Chicago. The other four are leaders of the group who live abroad and are being sought, Ashcroft said.

Palestinian Islamic Jihad was founded in the late 1970s, and its roots go back to the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt that also spawned the Hamas terrorist group. Its goals, according to the indictment, are to destroy Israel and end Western influence in the Middle East.

The group's alleged killings have included suicide bombings, car bombings and drive-by shootings, including a June 5, 2002, suicide attack in Haifa, Israel, that killed 20 and injured 50.

Among the people whose deaths are blamed on the organization are two U.S. citizens: Alisa Flatow, 20, and Shoshana Ben-Yishai, 16.

Alisa Flatow, then a junior at Brandeis University, died in a 1995 bus bombing in the Gaza Strip.

Her father, Stephen Flatow of West Orange, N.J., said Thursday, "This demonstrates the old saw about the wheels of justice – they grind slow, but they grind exceedingly fine."

The indictment describes numerous intercepted telephone calls and faxes in which those charged are said to have discussed Islamic Jihad bombings and other attacks, financial problems and whether to ally more closely with terror groups Hezbollah and Hamas. There is no mention of al-Qaida.

The men frequently talk in apparent code, substituting words like "magazine" and "shirt" for thousands of dollars they were allegedly funneling to Islamic Jihad.

To date, Ashcroft said, the Justice Department has investigated 70 terrorist financing or support organizations, winning 23 convictions and freezing $113 million in assets of 62 organizations.

The Islamic Jihad fund-raising and other alleged activities were centered on two organizations in Tampa: the Islamic Committee for Palestine – originally called Islamic Concern Project Inc. – and the World and Islamic Studies Enterprise or WISE, according to the indictment. Most of those charged also had some connection to the University of South Florida at one time or another.

Besides Al-Arian, those arrested were:

-Sameeh Hammoudeh, 42, born in the West Bank, now a resident of Temple Terrace, Fla. He is an instructor at the University of South Florida and administrator at the Islamic Academy of Florida.

-Hatim Naji Fariz, 30, born in Puerto Rico and now living in Spring Hill, Fla. He is a manager at a medical clinic.

-Ghassan Zayed Ballut, 41, a West Bank native now living in Tinley Park, Ill., and owner of a small business.

Those living abroad were:

-Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, 45, a Gaza Strip native and now resident of Damascus, Syria. He is described as the worldwide leader of Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a former instructor at the University of South Florida and former executive director of the World Islam and Studies Enterprise.

approach might be to seek a $1 billion congressional appropriation that would then permit Turkey to obtain loans at preferential U.S. government rates for many times that amount.

"We are waiting to hear back from the Turks," Powell said. "I think they understand the importance of this issue to us, and to our efforts, and they've got it under consideration now."

Ships carrying equipment for a U.S. infantry division are already at sea. The United States wants to base tens of thousands of soldiers in Turkey to open a possible northern front against Iraq.

The dispute with Turkey is one of many problems the Bush administration has as it tries to line up support for an attack on Iraq if Saddam doesn't disarm quickly.

Implying the United States might deploy troops elsewhere if terms could not be reached with Turkey, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said "we have to deal with realities, and we will."

Meanwhile, President Bush sought to keep the pressure on the Security Council, telling a suburban Atlanta audience, "Denial and endless delay in the face of growing danger is not an option."

The president has said the council risks irrelevance if it does not face up to Iraq's defiance of more than 10 years of disarmament resolutions.

Bush also has said if the council does not approve a second resolution he is prepared to go to war with a "coalition of the willing" – nations like Britain that agree with him that Iraq's arsenals of biological and chemical weapons pose a threat.

Bush planned to host Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar of Spain, an ally, at his Texas ranch Friday and Saturday. Another potential ally, Prime Minister Simeon Saxcoburggotski of Bulgaria, is due next Tuesday at the White House.

been around for quite sometime. One of those innovative features is the "who is eating my bandwidth" page. The page tells students about who is sucking up all the bandwidth on campus. They have graphs of the bandwidth that is used at each residential area, as well as the academic buildings on campus.

When asked why he continues to run the Daily Jolt website on the UMass campus, Jason Fussell said, "The UMass Jolt existed before me. It's two years old now – it was terrible before this year – no one ever updated anything or took care of it. I thought it would be really good if UMass had a quality site, a place where the community could come together."

"[The new things will be] adding a second comic strip, [called] Valley of the Squirrels," he added. "Sometime soon we'll be adding some really cool new features: a Newsfeed box, which will have headlines on all sorts of things, an enhanced Procrastination Page, and we'll be bulking up the Internet Radio page."

War Powers Act might need to be revisited

A lawsuit seeking an injunction against President George W. Bush was filed in federal court in Boston last week. The suit was filed by several lawmakers and a group of parents of military personnel who are opposed to war in Iraq.

The injunction accuses Bush and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld of going against the Constitution – or at least potentially doing so. The accused will only be guilty, said the lawsuit, if military action starts in Iraq that they say oversteps the constitutional power of the president. According to Article 1, Section 8 of The Constitution, only Congress can declare war.

This hasn't happened since World War II.

Lawsuits against Bush presidents, however, have happened before. A similar injunction citing the first President Bush was denied by a federal judge in 1990 after 54 members of congress filed a lawsuit. The consequent Persian Gulf "war" joined the ranks of Vietnam, Korea and Bosnia as undeclared wars.

The president does have the authority to commit troops to an area and even start military maneuvers, but he is required under law to ask Congress for a declaration of war shortly after.

"The president is not a king," the group's lead attorney John Bonifaz said. Bonifaz referred to the War Powers act of 1973 which requires congressional approval for military action abroad. Congress did pass a resolution last October allowing military action in Iraq, but the suit contends that this was not a declaration of war.

The problem is that the loose terms of the War Powers act and perhaps the loose definitions of war allow Bush, Rumsfeld and others acting under the auspices of the executive branch of government to rattle sabers and on occasional use them.

If a group of concerned citizens is looking to stop a war, Bush and his predecessors have made it obvious that such lawsuits are not the way to go. This sort of barricade has failed before. Besides the suit in 1990, there have been protests and popular discomforts about wars since 1973 and long before. The fact that military action has persisted without any judicial backlash resounds the idea that it will probably happen again.

If Congress and voters want to see an end to this unsolicited military action then they should seek a War Powers act of 2003. Prior approval of congress should be required, not suggested. Also, resolutions like the one passed last October should be prohibited and a closer timetable should be put on the start of military action and when war has been declared.

Any of these moves would simply be bolstering the system of checks and balances that is supposed to prevent an imbalance of power. The three-tiered system was designed to do just that, but something has to be put in place to support the original plan.

Stopping the U.S. military from being used as a police force worldwide is an enormous task, but boosting checks and balances back in place would be a good place to start.

One Bomb, one flight, and millions of casualties. This is the true horror of nuclear warfare. Since that fateful day in Japan in 1945, the world has known the horror and power that these weapons bring. An event that President Truman termed "the greatest thing in history" was the beginning of an extremely scary era.

Today the fear is realized again. With colored coded warnings from the government, talk of war, and possible terror attacks, the fear that embodied the American citizen in the Cold War has resurfaced.

In the 1950s, atomic warheads were in the Taiwan strait. In fact, President Eisenhower told a reporter that they would be used just as bullets if the time came. These are scary realities. And these realities surround us again with the ongoing crisis in North Korea, Iraq, and those pesky terrorists.

The nuclear weapon is a peculiar thing. Though it brings so much death and destruction, it is argued that it also brings superior security. Nations think twice before attacking a nuclear power. And when one nation attains this power, other nations find it necessary to achieve this power as well so that they can maintain a balance and not be dominated. And so this is one way nuclear weapons spread across the globe. We got the bomb and let the French and the British in on the secret, so the Soviets had to have it.

Once they had it the Chinese didn't want to be left out. And as soon as India got it, Pakistan followed. It provided for scary times yet they were relatively peaceful times for those nations, save India and Pakistan in the '70s, and that didn't "go nuclear." Several other nations have attempted nuclear programs like Argentina, Brazil, and South Africa before they gave them up. Israel also "has" nuclear weapons, but its programs are highly secretive. And it took a lot of American diplomacy in the 70's to get South Korea and Taiwan to abandon their ambitious attempts at getting that radioactive prize.

Now North Korea wants (has/had?) the bomb and I wonder who could blame them. They are surrounded by nations who do not wish them well. Russia has the bomb, as do the Chinese. The Japanese and the South Koreans do not but they are on very friendly terms with the U.S., which in turn to the North Koreans is threatening. The last Stalinist regime in the world has a lot to be worried about. So it seems that they are searching for that security that comes with the nuclear warhead. This might be logical for the North Koreans but it presents a problem to the U.S.

North Korea is by no means friendly to the U.S. or the opposite. As President Bush told Bob Woodward he "loathes" Kim Jong Il and his regime. Second, the North Koreans have shown their willingness to sell weapons in the past and are in desperate need of oil as well. This would make one think that there could be dealings with the Middle East. Now I'm not saying that Kim Jong Il has the "Axis of Evil" on speed dial but I would also not assert that he is the most rational man either.

Another problem with a Korean bomb, aside from the blatant threat to the American continent, is that it would in turn rouse fear in Japan and South Korea and it would be nearly impossible for the U.S. to expect those nations not to go nuclear at that point.

"This is an enemy that is fueled by our hatred for it. We could kill terrorists every day and never win this war."

Looking at the Korean situation, the best way to go about solving the problem is diplomacy, maybe even send a high level diplomat like a secretary of state and show the Koreans that you are serious about talking to them. Also, if the current administration refuses to resolve the Korean "non-crisis" by diplomacy because that was how President Clinton had handled it they should take a step back and realize how foolish they are being, not to mention down right dangerous.

That's the thing about dealing with nuclear powers; you really don't want to get them angry at you. A nuclear power may not have a superior army, or even an army at all but the fact that they have the weapon of mass destruction makes them an asymmetrical force, as the political scientists like to call them, and you have to recognize and respect that.

A greater problem arises when weapons like this, whether they are nuclear, biological or chemical, fall into the hands of terrorist networks. What would happen if al-Qaeda had a weapon like this and decided to use it? Imagine if the target was civilian, how can we deal with something like this?

The answer is very simple: it's nearly impossible. These networks are not nation-states; they have no borders, no representatives, and no declared property. We can only imagine what capabilities they could have. And how could we use deterrence or this theory of mutually assured destruction that got us through the cold war against people who are already committed to paying the ultimate price? You can't.

It is illogical to approach the problem from this angle; this is a new enemy(s) with different objectives than what we had used MAD to deter. We need to recognize this and approach it differently. Sure we could play peek-a-boo in endless caves with flashlights and a gun in hand but how is that helping us stop the problem? This is an enemy that is fueled by our hatred for it. We could kill terrorists every day and never win this war. That should tell us something. My admonitions to policy makers would be to stay as diplomatic as possible; belligerence only leads to further violence and we have seen enough of that. In the Cold War era, which we so narrowly escaped from safety, we created many enemies in the periphery that may come back to haunt us. So now we must keep the future, not just the past in mind when considering decisions to avert tragedies tomorrow.

Ralph Waldo Emerson said "the most advanced nations are the ones that navigate the most."

For mine and for the unborn generations, I hope our decision makers can be navigators in these difficult times. If not, our ship is sure to sink.

Miscommunication is the root

Scott Eldridge II

This past weekend cities around the world were deluged with peace rallies. In London, millions gathered. In Rome, millions gathered. Australia saw its largest numbers at a demonstration in the history of the country. Around the world, crowds gathered straddling the spectrum, from a handful of people at town centers and city halls to the thousands and millions that made headlines.

At every turn of every rally and march there was a common message of peace and anti-war sentiment. At many of these rallies there was also a sense of civility towards those protesting, those watching and those whose job it is to keep the situation under control, namely the police.

In New York this past weekend, protestors ran into the police department head on.

At first there were no clear problems. Walking down Third Avenue past the officers guarding their street blocks, it seemed like another peaceful march. Sure, there were hordes of people flowing through the streets, but the idea that the crowd had to move further north before joining the rally was well-communicated by the officers. Even as the crowds grew and spilled into the street, efforts to bring people back onto the sidewalk were done coolly and quickly.

After turning the corner from Third and heading towards Second and First Avenues the crowd could no longer flow on the sidewalks. The narrow road was side to side a mass of people. But there were no problems here either. The flow was slow, coming to a total standstill once or twice, but it made its way.

Then the tide changed.

Contrived looks trickled through the crowd as the current changed. Handfuls of people at a time turned back against the tide and retreated toward Third. By the time Second Avenue was in plain view it was obvious why. A dam had been built by blue-suited officers standing shoulder to shoulder, preventing the crowd from streaming forward.

Before long, those who had turned back rejoined the mass. Apparently the road was closed in the other direction as well. With the swell of people now confined to one block, the sixth option was to leak through on the sidewalk. Then, like a wave breaking through, the crowd made its way down Second Avenue only to be stemmed once more.

Splashing about in a new one-block area the crowd waved back and forth and continued their chants and proclaimed their message ever louder. It was obvious that there was little hope of moving forward, but the waves of people moved when they could, danced when they could and splashed about when they could.

"Splashing about in a new one-block area the crowd waved back and forth and continued their chants and proclaimed their message ever louder."

In an effort to divide this sea of people the NYPD mounted officers came into the block. On their horses the officers waded in and tried to divide the crowd. "Move to the sidewalk" and "get back" were the only words from their mouths. Without any message of intent or purpose, and facing a flood of 7,000 (the NYPD estimate for people in one city block) the crowds swelled, but never subsided.

People crashed into each other, and whatever was around them, in an effort to get away from the steeds. Rising up, breaking and flowing back into the middle. This cycle continued for several minutes. When the officers would settle on one place and abandon their line people flowed back into the void. Again the horses stormed through, creating a path, letting a car through. Again the void was filled.

It became obvious that the reason for the horses, the reason for the police, the reason we were being forced from side to side, was to get traffic through. Eventually the levee broke and the crowd, save a few lost to arrest and detainment, flowed east, within five blocks of where the rally was being held.

For the many parts of the crowd that moved on, there was a bad feeling all around. Feelings of resentment towards a non-communicative group of mounted officers, feeling of confusion towards a NYPD that couldn't explain what they were trying to do but instead resorted to throwing huge animals at relatively small people, feelings of anger mostly.

All of this anger and resentment and bad imagery could have been avoided.

If there was any effort to explain that cars needed to get through, the crowd could have flowed smoothly, if there were officers on foot explaining where the crowd could go, things could have flowed smoothly.

None of these things happened in New York, and that is a problem.

Mistrusting our leaders

Eduardo Bustamante

I am standing on a field. A white line runs through its middle, separating a mass of people into two. I am on the left side of the line. If one followed the line to the end of the field, one would encounter a large tower, and atop the tower, a room with tinted windows. Everyone on my side of the line is unarmed and holding signs. On the opposite side, I see countless armed men and women in military gear prepared to travel to faraway lands and sacrifice their lives in battle. Many of them are my peers, old classmates and lifelong friends.

I step back to observe the surroundings. There is a disdain for me in their eyes, and disdain for them in mine. Mud flies over my head. I am holding up a sign that I am especially proud of. It says, "WAR IS GOOD FOR BUSINESS: INVEST YOUR SON!" A pretty girl standing next to me, smiles at me before the sign is bludgeoned by the mud of friendly fire.

I turn my ear to the mud flying from the left: "How could anyone derive pleasure from marching in lines like sheep? Their ability to kill unquestionably like drones is a testament to their inhumanity! How dare they look down upon us when we risk arrest to save countless lives from an unjust war!"

The people on the left side of the line believe themselves to be heroes, and their logic is sound; there is no more commendable act than to save lives, and what better way than to prevent an unnecessary war?

I turn my eyes to the gas masked soldiers on the right, as they lift their sticks and aim their tear gas at their former peers: "How dare they be anything but grateful to us? We who sacrifice our lives to prevent madmen from unleashing weapons of mass destruction against innocent civilians. We who place ourselves in harm's way so they can protest! They are weak! Godd___ dirty, hippy, communist, ungrateful *@&&@#s!" Every person on the right side also considers himself to be a hero, and his logic is sound. They save lives and protect our freedoms by fighting in necessary wars. Something doesn't fit. The reasons I chose the left side of the field are far from profound – I was recalcitrant, needed an identity, and was attracted to the pretty liberal girls. My feeling is that many of my peers on the other side of the line made their choices for similar reasons.

"Endless anthems have been sung, flags flown, praise yielded, allegiances pledged, medals awarded, holidays celebrated, and hands shaken by presidents to convince us to trust the wealthiest one percent no matter how many times they lie to us."

Anti-war protesters and soldiers have more in common than they realize. In a sense, they are like-minded enemies. Each has the same goal – to take personal risks in order to save others – and each sees the opposite side as an obstacle to its noble goal. Both sides are equally self-righteous, and each views their persecution by the other as evidence of their role as savior.

This brings me to the tower with the tinted windows – the place from which the dividing line stems – the home of the wealthiest one percent, the brains behind the "war machine." Where secrets are kept in the name of "national security," where war propaganda is carefully crafted to manipulate American values.

Endless resources have been invested by the top one percent to feed us the line, and it extends back as far as we can remember. It started with the emphasis placed on presidents and founding fathers in elementary school. Continued, through the revision of history books that make all past U.S. military action seem just, omit military follies and repress Anti-American sentiments. During our couch potato years, video games, media, and advertisers bombarded us with images and slogans that made military service appear to be the world's most honorable profession.

As we grow and become politically aware American news corporations give us stories in regards to foreign policy that directly conflict the reports of every other international news source.

Endless anthems have been sung, flags flown, praise yielded, allegiances pledged, medals awarded, holidays celebrated, and hands shaken by presidents to convince us to trust the wealthiest one percent no matter how many times they lie to us.

The latest line is that war with Iraq is "necessary." Ultimately, Americans are divided in the Iraqi conflict to those that believe the line and those that don't. It is wrong and unnecessary for strong and admirable people who share the same goal to be torn apart because they don't know if they can trust their leaders. I gave up on being able to trust George W. when I found out he owned an oil company. We can't follow a leader we don't trust.

Nintendo's next dark horse rides a tricycle?

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Since last quarter, Nintendo's GameCube has pulled itself back into the video game market with the huge blockbuster, "Metroid Prime." Now it looks to further itself with the March 24 release of "Zelda: The Wind Walker." As an added bonus, if you pre-order the game, you get a GameCube version of "The Ocarina of Time" and a Japanese import dubbed "Ocarina of Time: The Master Quest." "The Master Quest" is an expanded version released in Japan with extras, and the dungeons are a bit harder, even to the most experienced players.

With all of this wonderful news, is there any doubt Link will possibly outdo the recently upgraded Samus Aran. Actually, many gamers believe Link will not measure up to the hype behind the game. One problem people have difficulty accepting is that Link will look like a child throughout the game. Most fans of the Zelda series have only seen Link in his child form in the previews. On the other hand, producer Miyamoto and director Aonuma answered questions on Nintendo's Zelda web page.

"In our eyes, we think he matures in the game," Miyamoto said in response to a question on if Link ages in the new game. "As to whether or not he grows old, we want you to play the game and find out for yourselves."

Publisher & Developer: Nintendo
Genre: Action, RPG

On the graphics controversy, Miyamoto responded, "I think that when people first see the game, the graphics are the first thing they talk about. Once you play the game, you'll really come to understand why we went with this graphic style. Also, the more you play the game, the more you get sucked into the graphic style. You forget about it."

According to the producer and director of this new chapter in the "Legend of Zelda" series, it should be 10 times better than "Metroid Prime." They've created mind-blowing environments and have brought over similar sounds, music and characters from the "Ocarina of Time." They also introduce a unique storyline involving the wind and have improved Link's facial expressions, adding a better feel to the game.

While Miyamoto and Aonuma emphasize that the graphics alone should not cause this much controversy, it will probably hurt the games sales when the big opening day arrives. As of now, most people I have spoken with will not be purchasing the game. Of course, their opinions could change if it's revealed the game play sucks you in faster than the Textbook Annex sucks the money out of your wallet.

If you download the trailer/preview of the game, you can see the images are nice and crisp. Plus, it appears to be a smooth playing game, like "Metroid," without much loading times. "The Wind Walker" also involves a cloud of mystery, as no one really knows how the full motion video looks, how the story is structured or if it is possible that

Kathleen Edwards makes her mark with 'Failer'

By Chris Flouton-Barnes
Collegian Staff

With the Senators sitting comfortably atop the NHL standings, Ottawa has already basked in the warm glow of success this frigid winter season. Our northern neighbor's capital has further cause for celebration, though, as local daughter Kathleen Edwards climbs the charts with her debut album on Cambridge's Zoe Records.

Kathleen Edwards 'Failer' Zoe Records

Edwards' songs plumb the dark recesses of tired taverns and automobiles, giving voice to characters unafraid of mouthing off to the stranger on the barstool next to them. Her tales of failed dreams and spoiled relationships rise above life's bittersweet twists with a frank honesty, where she ultimately acknowledges the hope and light shed by a strong will and determined resilience. Like the all-natural Mirlo condiments canned in her hometown, "Failer" is an organic blend of ingredients grounded in earthy probity.

The first track, "Six O'Clock News," is the first single pegged for radio, and the jangly guitar hook is tailor made for AAA playlists. Right on its heels is "One More Song the Radio Won't Like," similar in both structure and instrumentation, with Jim Bryson filling out Edwards' acoustic foundation and sonorous vocals with tasteful, but unremarkable, electric guitar lines.

"12 Bellevue" throws a couple of saxophones into the mix, adding a festive flair to this straight ahead rocker. Singing here in the first person, Edwards is full of defiant assertiveness with a hint of self-destruction. The recycled rhythms and delivery of "Westbo" take some of the sheen off the album's most darkly humorous narrative. Edwards rebounds quickly, though, injecting an REM-like guitar crunch into "Maria," with Fred Guignon swooping through a wonderfully distorted slide guitar solo.

"Failer" concludes with a brace of beautifully sparse, poignant numbers. Trained on the classical violin, Edwards writes and plays all of her string arrangements, and on "National Steel," her overdubbed harmonies ring with the texture of a chordophone as well. The tender resignation of "Sweet Little Duck" brings the album to a close with Edwards' guitar disappearing inside a swirling mist of feedback, piano and pedal steel.

Kathleen Edwards' songwriting is prone to rather awkward syllabification, and her lurching delivery sounds disjointed at first listen, but this album improves with time. Full of conflicted characters and torn emotions, the stories and songs alike resist immediate scrutiny and instead reward patience and attentiveness. "Failer" promises to be the first of many successes for this 24-year-old Canadian.

Kathleen Edwards plays the Iron Horse in Northampton on Feb. 26.

'Daredevil' a realistic view of a superhero

By Erik Taylor
Collegian Staff

The beginning of the year's big budgeted blockbusters has begun with "Daredevil." This movie has been held with high and low expectations, ranging from the rabid fans of the comic book to the disbelievers of Ben Affleck. When it was all said and done, director Mark Steven Johnson delivered his version of The Man Without Fear – a dark and gritty vision of a human being's quest for justice in a world drenched in violence.

'Daredevil'
Directed by Mark Steven Johnson
Starring Ben Affleck, Jennifer Garner
20th Century Fox
110 mins

The emphasis on human being is what sets this movie apart from other superhero films. Blind Attorney Matt Murdock is not a billionaire. He does not have superhuman strength, and he suffers every time he dons his leather devilish outfit. His only attributes are enhanced senses that are brilliantly brought to life by the "Rhythm & Hues" special effects team. His "shadow world" is brought to life by a sound's vibrations, his exact sense of smell and his extremely sensitive touch. He uses these abilities to punish those who corrupt the Hell's Kitchen neighborhood of New York City.

Ben Affleck does an incredible job bringing the blind attorney from the pages of the comic book to the big screen. His eyes are glazed over with a fog, and his stare is blank and lazy. The small character touches added to the film, such as his dark apartment and brail labeled clothing, bring viewers further into his sightless world. Since his beatings on local thugs aren't always one way, he pops a few pain killers and removes loose teeth, reminding us this superhero is capable of real hurt.

The world that surrounds Daredevil is brought to life by the supporting cast. Jennifer Garner is stunning as the Greek assassin Elektra. Michael Clark Duncan is menacing and imposing as Kingpin. John Favreau is Daredevil's bumbling connection to his humanity and a hilarious one at that. The major contribution, however, is Colin Farrell as the scene-stealing Bullseye. This trembling-with-psychosis murderer is electrifying under Farrell's skill as an actor. The scene with Bullseye and the old woman on the plane says it all.

So, is this one of the best movies ever made? No. Is it a worthy addition to the pantheon of superhero properties being converted to feature films? Yes. It is an honest adaptation that will have skeptic fans of the comic relieved and the non-fans satisfied. It does make some changes that sticklers of the comic will despise. However, these changes could be considered necessary to the ever-increasing cynical movie-going audience. Daredevil in the comics would never let a criminal die, much less pop prescription drugs, but this code of ethics was born in the 60s and not the 21 century, where these types of things aren't necessarily frowned upon.

"Daredevil" does have its problems as a film, though. It could have been a tad bit longer, just like "Spider-Man" could have been a tad shorter. With so much going on in these character's lives, each one could have been given more screen time. The connection between Kingpin and Daredevil's childhood is a weak one – nothing that couldn't have been remedied with further exploration of Kingpin's criminal dealings. Also, the special effects could have been cleaner in some parts, and Elektra and Bullseye's movements could be based more in reality. But, hey, it is a comic book movie after all.

"Daredevil" succeeds in bringing us a comic book film worthy of everyone's attention. With all of the doubt being thrown at this project, it defiantly stands as proof that if done right, a popular comic can make a popular film. While it does suffer some from the filmmakers' editing choices and various weak plot points, "Daredevil" is an enjoyable film with intriguing and exciting heroes, villains and much fun action.

Ben Affleck plays Matt Murdock, a blind lawyer by day and a mysterious vigilante superhero by night, in "Daredevil."

Zwan weathers changes of new band in 'Sea'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

It's been three years since we last heard from Billy Corgan, the tall, reedy-voiced singer for early '90s alt-rock favorites Smashing Pumpkins. The band was once the popular apex of college rock (circa 1994) that disintegrated publicly when it let grandiose ambitions get the best of it. The commercial disappointment of 1998's "Adore" led the Pumpkins on a downward slope that led to the critical and commercial flop of "MACHINA/Machine of the Gods" in 2000.

Since then, Corgan has set about the task of recollecting himself and sloughing off the faded memories of the Pumpkins' dissolution. And on "Mary Star of the Sea," the debut effort from Corgan's new outfit Zwan, the singer does indeed sound revitalized, like he's woken from a long and restful slumber. The music here snaps and pops, free of the sludginess that has plagued modern rock since the Pumpkins were smashed those many years ago, while Corgan sounds more relaxed and comfortable then he has been in awhile. This isn't the case of a burnt-out singer trying to recapture the magic; this is a case of a singer recharging his batteries and bringing the sharpness back to his music.

Zwan – which sounds like a cult leader in a bad sci-fi film, doesn't it? – could just about be an indie rock supergroup. Corgan lists himself in the credits as Billy Burke, but his nasal voice gives him away almost immediately. Corgan is reunited with ex-Pumpkins drummer Jimmy Chamberlin on skins, with a bill rounded out by Chavez's Matt Sweeney. A Perfect Circle bassist Paz Lenchantin and indie vet David Pajo (of Papa M, Slint, Tortoise and others.) The band crafts wide sonic vistas backed by a glorious three-guitar attack; the songs are built with a faith in Link grows up before our eyes into the sword-wielding hero we have come to know over the years.

Overall, Link is looking to cut and slash the competition on March 24 when he will be introduced to the United States. For those interested in getting the pre-order extras, you will have to check with your local retailer to find out when they stop taking pre-orders. The extras are in limited supply, as not even I will get a review copy of them. Those really into Zelda might want to rush out and get their names on the list. When I receive a copy to review, I will follow up on this story and let you gamers know if Link is a hero or a zero. Stay tuned.

UMass falls to St. Joe's

The Hawks would extend the lead to as much as 12 down the stretch, and with senior Nekole Smith in foul trouble, the Minutewomen lacked the punch to fight back.

"This is a team we haven't beaten in this generation," said Govan, explaining the source of the early flash on the UMass side. "And we really wanted to beat them, but all five players on the floor didn't have it at times."

"My team has to find a way to win," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "But I can't will it for them. I just can't get some of these kids to play with any emotion. We just can't find a way to win."

Govan, who finished the night with 15 points, four assists and three steals, was a pleasant surprise for the weakened Minutewomen, but was disappointed after the game.

"We did rather well," she said. "but I was a little disappointed. The way I played was pretty good, but tonight I'm disappointed with the turnovers."

"Mo stepped up big tonight, and she handled the ball very well," said Dacko of her new starting point guard.

With the loss, the Minutewomen drop to 5-37 all time against St. Joe's, with the last UMass win coming in 1998 on Valentine's Day.

The Minutewomen will look to snap their four-game losing streak on Sunday, as they take on Temple in the second of three straight crucial A-10 East games. The Owls, winners of three of their last four, currently sit in second place behind St. Joseph's, and edged the Minutewomen 89-80 in overtime earlier this season.

Dave and Reynolds to hit road together

Can you feel the excitement? Dave Matthews is going on tour again. But Dave will not be with his band members this time, as he has chosen to do an acoustic set with his good friend Tim Reynolds. The 12-show tour will last a little over two weeks. Dave and Tim will kick off their tour in Connecticut at the CareerBuilder.com Oakdale Theater and will end it at the Recreation Center at Carthage College in Kenosha, Wis. Matthews, who is known for his outstanding live shows, will again give his fans their money's worth.

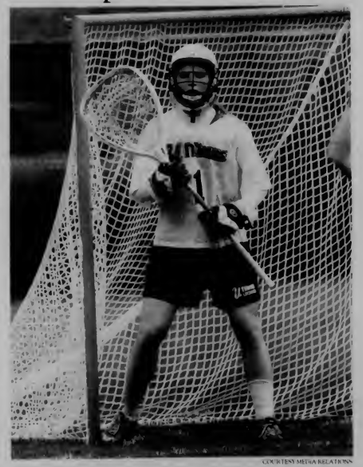
Dave Matthews and Tim Reynolds hit the road again to for another college tour.

Most of Dave's spring tour will be played at colleges and universities all across America. The University of Rhode Island, Purdue University and Central Michigan University are just some of the lucky schools expecting Dave.

Now, if you are unfamiliar with previous Dave Matthews tours, let me give you a little insight - his shows are legendary. This is not the first time Dave Mathews and Tim Reynolds have played together. Actually, most people do not know that the two have played numerous times in the past. The two launched a similar tour a couple of years ago, and many of the venues were colleges and universities.

I know what you are all thinking. For people who are just average Dave listeners, one must wonder about Tim Reynolds. For most people, Reynolds is like a mystery man who, once in a while, decides to join Matthews on tour. For all who do not know Reynolds' music, he is one of the best acoustic guitar players of today.

Born in Weisbaden, Germany, Reynolds was forced to move around a lot growing up because his father was in the army. At age 18, Reynolds moved on and eventually settled in Charlottesville, Va., the same place Matthews got his beginning as a musician.



Similar to Reynolds, Matthews was born outside of the United States. Matthews was born in South Africa in 1967 and lived there for most of his childhood. Matthews came to the United States in the early '90s and started one of the most popular bands the world has seen.

Out for over a year now, the Dave Matthews Band's latest album "Busted Stuff" is still riding high with excellent album sales. Songs like "Bartender," "Grey Street" and "Grace is Gone" have become new hit songs for Matthews.

In 1996, Matthews and Reynolds released the live album "Live at Luther College," which featured some great songs redone acoustically, producing a sound that is downright awesome. Anyone who does not own a cops should go pick one up immediately. I am just hoping the two decide to come out with another live album after this show. After years of playing, these two successful musicians are right where they want to be – on top of the world.

Minutewomen hope for a fast start will have to step up in the traditionally conservative UMass offense. Pollock is especially important due to her responsibility of calling the plays behind the cage, and will be called upon to add at least 10 more goals. Emery will also be looking to add to her team-leading stat point total of 35 a year ago.

Senior goaltender Cyndi Doyle looks to improve on her .528 save percentage as the anchor of the Minutewoman defense.

Robinson, the leading goal scorer for the Minutewomen last season with 28 goals, will get a chance to improve that stat in the new attack oriented offense. If Emery and Robinson can do some serious damage during games, then the Minutewomen will be on the right track.

Emery and Robinson, however, are not the only ones tallying points for the Maroon and White. Pollock finished last year with 20 points and led the team with 42 ground balls.

Defense will also be very important. With the team being outscored last year by 10 goals, junior Andrea Valachovic, sophomore All-Conference team member Kristin St. Hilaire and senior captain Bridget Byrne will need to close the door on opposing attackers. Valachovic will also play an important role in the transition game. Senior goalies Emma Butcher and Cyndi Doyle will serve as the last line of defense. As the starter, Doyle had a career year in 2002 with 146 saves and a 9.49 goals against average.

The Minutewomen will kick off their season on Saturday following the men's contest with Sacred Heart, as they will host Holy Cross on Garber Field at 4 p.m.

Burning metal bands warm the soul during cold days

By MICHAEL BARRETT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Over the past month, while most of us have been whining over how cold and harsh this winter has been, our European brethren have been using all their indoor time to thrash out the first crop of this year's new metal.

Germany's legendary Nuclear Blast Records, a label that has endured much grief in U.S. markets over the past few years, has found a (not so) new domestic distribution deal with America's Century Media. Together they put out the newest CD from Raunchy, "Velvet Noise." A newer band in the well-tread and frightfully popular "Swedish Metal" style, "Velvet Noise" has 10 songs very similar to songs by In Flames or Shadows Fall.

Raunchy's sound rides a fine line between Cyber-metal and new-school groove/core. It will be no surprise if some tracks from this disc show up in skater videos and extreme sports-themed commercials over the next year. Songs like "Leech" and "Twelve Feet Tall" are melodic and catchy enough to catch the attention of the Ozzfest crowd, but not too clean as to alienate underground purists.

Also on Century Media, on the newly picked up Spine Farm label, is "Songs For Withering," the newest CD from Finland's Rapture. Definitely not to be confused with the U.S. No-Wave band, this is superbly crafted progressive death metal. It is melodic and dark, with vocals that glide between angelic beauty and sandblasted roars and with guitarists that effortlessly weep a song craft that straddles deftly placed solos and heavy riffage without relying too heavily on one convention or the other. Well-written and produced, "Songs for Withering" maintains a distinct metal edge without getting too high on its own skill, making it a perfect soundtrack for the winter blahs.

Also on Spine Farm is Throne Of Chaos. Its CD, "Persevirtico," is German-styled power metal; a bit too reliant on a mediocre keyboardist and a singer who's voice is not quite that great. If you stay to the big guns of the new Power Metal movement - Iced Earth, Rhapsody and Strativarious - you'll be better off.

Another melodic/progressive band, Peaceville Records, from the U.K. has just released a pseudo-anthology/best-of CD of The Blood Divine, called "Pantheon Dreams." Formed by ex-members of Cradle Of Filth and Anathema, this band is an odd combination of the gothic style of earlier C.O.F. albums and the blues-influenced doom riffs of Anathema's later work. Seriously, I can't complain about an album when a Hammond B3 organ is involved. Make sure to check out "Crazy Horses."

Emperor also has a new double CD anthology, "Scattered Ashes - A Decade Of Emperial Wrath," to be released on Candlelight USA, hitting stores on March 25. Featuring tracks from all its albums, remixes, songs from the hard-to-find (and often pricey) import-only EPs, a remix by Ulver and what appeared on tracks from their demo (!), this is a Black Metal fan's wet dream. If you've only heard the hype but never witnessed the fury and satanic majesty that was Emperor, this is a great place to start.

And last but not least, returning to the American music scene is "Animositisomina," the newest CD from Ministry. This is Rev. Al Jourgensen's first new studio album in three and a half years. "Animositisomina" pretty much picks up where "Psalm 69" had left off in 1992. It's a slower, denser album, where the guitars are augmented by static and white noise. The tempo may be a bit slower, but this album reclaims some of the sonic prowess of Ministry's peak in the late '80s and early '90s. Al gives a nod to Adrian Sherwood's production techniques on 1985's "Twitch," and throws in the unrelenting buzz saw guitar and ear shredding tape noise of songs from "Psalm 69," like "Hero" or "Corrosion," not to mention the great cover of Magazine's classic New Wave tune, "The Light Pours Out Of Me."

There are a few CDs that'll help shun away the freezing cold and the feet of ice and snow that have encapsulated us into this winter wonderland. I hate to use a cliché when I say it, but we need the triumph of metal to free us from this freezing hell.

Debut Zwan album largely a success

crunching muscularity and harmonic precision.

Corgan, Pato and Sweeney are all guitarists, and Zwan slathers on the beefy six-string sound. The trio assail the songs from all sides, backed by Chamberlin's rubber-hullet drumming. The only thing here that lacks distinction is Lenchantin's bass, and that may only be because the spotlight on a three-pronged guitar assault swallows the poor girl up. Still, Lenchantin provides solid, understated support and her sweet backing vocals underline the songs with an even tighter melodic focus.

Corgan & Co. know a thing or two about anthemic choruses; the songs straddle a line between indie rock purity and rousing arena rock bombast. Just listen to the way the wistful verses on "Declarations of Faith" give way to big, chewy choruses full of blissful aural expansion. The indie stars of Zwan have a firm grasp on radio-friendly structure, as on the gorgeous, churning swirl of "Honestly" and the chugging "Settle Down." Zwan manage to make pop-savvy hooks while keeping their grit and integrity.

The new positivity that has crept into Corgan since his dismantling of the Pumpkins has given Zwan a sharper edge. Corgan sounds downright happy here and his lyrics – "Maybe we were born to kiss another/maybe we were born to run forever" – reflect his contentment. The music does too, as on the rapture of "Honestly." This is rock music that manages to hang on both sides of the same contradictory coin: loud, humming throb with a pretty, spangly allure.

There are plenty of musical nuggets to chew here, like the delicate acoustic lament "Of A Broken Heart," the ruhhers "Ride A Black Swan" and the chanting "Lyric." "Endless Summer" is pure, tasty pop-metal candy. The album's penultimate track, "Jesus, I/Mary Star of the Sea" is an epic bit of new-prog that stretches on for a breathless fifteen minutes. It starts on like a hymn before, at around the two-minute mark, the guitars crash like a tidal wave. They weave in and out of each other in a blistering patchwork of star-crossed neo-psychedelia, before the song settles into brooding quiet. Then, at the eight-minute mile, the drums and guitars hust back in. Wave after wave of curling guitar arrangements cascade over the listener; brave souls can venture into the tangle, while others may be looking for their breath afterward.

The songs do eventually wear one down after a while. Some of the songs, especially towards the center, sound good but are undistinguishable from another – they're very well made filler. Still, Zwan have made a hell of a debut here, sparkling and shining without losing strength and power. "Mary Star of the Sea" is perhaps the first great album of the year.

New coach welcomed

"Her ability to connect to her players and overall experience with the girls on the team makes for a good equation for success.

Bolduc also has a good grasp on the way things work with the Maroon and White, as she had been an assistant coach and defensive coordinator under Barnes for the last three years.

While coaching on Barnes' staff, Bolduc was in charge of working with the team's goaltenders and putting together game-day preparations. She also played a role in the recruiting aspect of the team.

"So far things have gone well," Bolduc said of her first head-coaching job. "It is pretty challenging...I have nothing to compare it to."

While a lot of her coaching time has been spent on defense, Bolduc has now focused on the offensive end of the field.

"We are stressing attack right now," she said. "It is important for them to work together up front."

She will be relying on leadership from her senior offensive core to step it up. Seniors Jada Emery, Lydia Robinson, Leslie Pollock and Kelli Kurtz will be asked to bear the brunt of the offensive load.

"We don't have a rock star (on offense), which is wonderful," Bolduc said. "There isn't one star to simply shut down."

The team hopes to put up more double-digit offensive performances this season, which were lacking from last years team. With the implementing of a more athletic offense, it appears Bolduc will have the Maroon and White pestering opposing goaltenders.

On defense Bolduc is hoping the group will be able to work with their already strong base, and that standout goalie Cyndi Doyle can slow down opposing offenses.

"They need to use their natural abilities together," Bolduc said. "We need to stress certain tactics and it is important that they start to gel."

The team, itself, seems to be pleased with the way Bolduc has been conducting practices so far.

"It's more intense," said senior Jada Emery. "She demands more discipline from us."

The Minutewomen will be taking on a very challenging Atlantic 10 conference, which features strong squads including both of Bolduc's old college teams, Temple and Syracuse.

The Minutewomen have been given a preseason rank of third in the A-10, and Bolduc is pleased with this initial placement.

"It kind of puts us as an underdog," she said. "I like playing from behind."

Saturday will be the first test for the Maroon and White, as it will battle Holy Cross at home on Garber Field.

"I am excited to see how we do, and I hope the weather is friendly," Bolduc said.

"I have high ambitions in a way... we have to look at things day to day, not too far ahead."

A downward spiral

UMass drops fourth in a row

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — The backcourt resembled a MASH unit as the Massachusetts women's basketball team came into the City of Brotherly Love looking for a bit of fortune to go its way.

St. Joseph's	61
UMass	50

But the Maroon and White's struggles continued, and it lost a 61-50 decision to Saint Joseph's last night at the Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse on Hawk Hill. Senior Jennifer Butler led all scorers with 17 points and earned her 20th double-double of the season thanks to her 12 rebounds, but it wasn't enough, as the depleted Minutewomen (12-12, 4-9 Atlantic 10) couldn't stay with the Hawks (15-9, 10-3 A-10), who sit atop the A-10 East.

The loss puts UMass in a tie with Rhode Island for fifth in the Atlantic 10 East. Both clubs are off until Sunday, when the Minutewomen travel to Temple and the Rams host Richmond.

It was the fourth loss in a row for the Minutewomen, who were without the services of Katie Nelson (likely out for the season), Cleo Foster (gone until playoff time) and Ebony Pegues, who was out after breaking an unspecified team rule. Pegues will return on Sunday.

This put the offense in the only mildly-tested hands of sophomore Monique Govan, who played a hard, spirited 40 minutes. Handed the keys to a confused, and at times toothless offense, the five-foot-five guard from Chicago performed admirably, although her four turnovers stood out.

The Minutewomen bucked a recent trend of coming out of the blocks flat, and played an energetic first half. All that energy may have caught up with them though, as the Hawks were able to take advantage of a number of Maroon and White miscues.

SJU began to pull away just inside the 10-minute mark, and an Erin Brady prayer as the shot clock expired took St. Joe's to a 43-40 lead with seven and a half minutes to go.

The time is now for Minutemen

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Tom Fallon has had enough.

He's tired of evening practices in the midst of an Amherst winter. No more digging balls out of the snow that lines Richard F. Garber Field. No more blowing chilled breath through his facemask at the teammate he's guarding.

Fallon's through with the preseason tease. He can't wait to finger his eye black, pull his No. 44 jersey over his 6-foot-4, 240 pound frame and put a lick on some poor unsuspecting Sacred Heart Pioneer.

"It's what we've been talking about since the fall," Fallon said. "We've been building toward the first game. Now it's time to get out there."

It's been a long winter for the Massachusetts lacrosse team. A month ago when the team started practicing, Mother Nature dumped almost two feet of snow on the ground.

Then on Monday, with the Minutemen in the meat of their season opening preparation, another 24 inches of snow buried the Pioneer Valley.

"We practiced a couple days inside," Fallon said. "Everybody's real focused."

Sacred Heart visits Garber Field for a 1 p.m. face-off tomorrow, and coach Greg Cannella isn't taking the unranked Pioneers (6-8 last year) lightly.

"I don't know who these people are [that say Sacred Heart's a lesser opponent]," Cannella said. "But they're nuts."

This is a team that won three of its last four games with the only loss to ranked Towson (18-17). And coach Tom Mariano has seven of his top eight scorers returning.

That group includes attackmen T. J. Hutmacher, who had 52 points, and Stephen Grabow, who led the Pioneers with 35 goals last season.

For the third straight year, UMass will run its trademark up-tempo offense. Since its implementation in 2001, the run-and-gun style has seen the Minutemen through to a pair of 12-win seasons and a run to the NCAA quarterfinals last year.

And like the past two seasons, Cannella will look for his midfielders to carry the load offensively.

"It would be nice if they got out early," Cannella said of his experienced and talented midfield. "You hope that the experienced guys can carry you offensively."

Preseason All-Americans Kevin Leveille and Chris Fiore will lead the Minutemen's stacked midfield unit. The pair combined for over 60 goals and 90 points last season.

Look for Jeff Zywicki and sophomore Chris Doyle to do some damage on the second midfield line as well.

The midfielders will be charged with taking the pressure off of a very young attack. Sophomore Gene Tundo and junior Kevin Glenz are the Minutemen's most experience attackmen and together they have only one year of starting experience.

On the other side of the ball, UMass should have a decided physical advantage. Fallon and fellow defensemen Chris Gervat and Matt Garcia are all athletic, and come in at 6-foot-2 inches or taller.

The Pioneers, on the other hand, don't have a starting attackman taller than 5-foot-9. But Fallon says they play bigger than they are.

"They play big," Fallon said. "They like to lean on us. They're not pure dodgers."

Sophomore goalie Bill Schell, who won the starting job midway through last season, will get the nod tomorrow.

"It's been good competition," Cannella said. "Derek [Kunkel] played well. But Billy's our man."

Senior defenseman Tom Fallon and the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team open its season Saturday as they take on Sacred Heart at Richard F. Garber Field at 1 p.m.

Softball to face stiff competition

By Jeff Boyd
Collegian Staff

The UMass softball team left early yesterday afternoon to compete in this weekend's NCAA Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Ga. Coming off a successful showing in the Fiesta Bowl Tournament two weeks ago, the No. 25 Minutewomen (2-3) are looking to again prove themselves against some of the top programs in the nation.

This weekend will mark the eighth consecutive year in which the Minutewomen have been invited to the NCAA Leadoff Classic. While in Columbus, UMass will find themselves competing against some of the elite programs the country has to offer including last year's champion Nebraska and defending national champion California.

This will probably be the toughest tournament that we will be in all year," said UMass head coach Elaine Sortino. "Everybody in it is ranked. I look who is in the top 25, then look at who is in this tournament. They're all there."

The format for the Leadoff Classic allows each team to participate in five games. The tournament consists of six pools, each with four teams. The winners of each pool advance to the championship bracket along with two at large bids, while the remaining teams will compete in a consolation bracket.

UMass has been graded with three of the nation's best programs, including No. 11 Florida State.

The Minutewomen will begin the tournament this afternoon against Oregon State. The Beavers come into the tournament ranked No. 18 in the nation with a record of 7-4. This weekend will mark the first meeting between the two teams.

Later this afternoon, UMass will face another team for the first time when they take to the field against the No. 20 Pacific Tigers. Pacific is 6-3 on the season and are coming off an impressive sweep of Saint Mary's in a doubleheader earlier this week.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen will play the final game of pool competition when they meet Florida State. Having won just 4 times in 15 games against the Seminoles, UMass will look to turn things around against Florida State.

"We're going to see good pitching," said Sortino. "The three teams that we play are all ranked and they all have good pitching staffs. Our challenges are going to be formidable."

If the Minutewomen hope to be one of the teams participating in Saturday afternoon's championship bracket, they will have to be near perfect on defense and explosive at the plate. Helping UMass' cause will be freshman pitcher Jenna Rusa, who is slated to make her debut for the Maroon and White

Minutewomen set to begin new era

UMass to open with Holy Cross

By Ari Jankelowitz
Collegian Correspondent

A change is on the horizon for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team.

First-year head coach Carrie Bolduc will bring a new approach to a previously defensive-minded team.

In achieving that goal, Bolduc said, "We are looking to step up the attacking, being speedier in transition. Rather than letting the opponent dictate the flow of the game, we have to dictate the pace."

This year's team lacks a superstar player, a difference maker. However, with three players who tallied over 50 points and five that had 17 or more in past seasons, this is a very balanced team that will prove to be hard to shut down.

The UMass women have a good senior corps, with eight seniors in the lineup.

"The team's skill is improving after each practice," Bolduc said. "The goals are being set, the wins will follow suit."

Some key players with this new attacking mindset are seniors Lydia Robinson, Leslie Pollock and Jada Emery, sophomore Maura McGarrity and senior captain Kelli Kurtz.

These players are the ones who

New coach Bolduc brings fresh approach, optimism

By Robert McGovern
Collegian Staff

After a season which saw a series of ups and downs for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, the loss of third-year coach Phil Barnes left the squad with a big question mark at the helm.

The Minutewomen didn't have to look far for an answer as they assigned former assistant Carrie Bolduc to take over for Barnes and push the team in a positive direction.

"The preseason was wonderful, they are definitely in shape," Bolduc said. "The focus is there and I have a good outlook on this season."

Bolduc is no stranger to success, as most of her collegiate career was spent on very competitive squads. The most successful of which was the 1997 Temple team that advanced all the way to the NCAA Final Four.

"I was an underclassmen on that team," Bolduc said. "There weren't as many pressures."

After spending two years playing for the Owls, she transferred to Syracuse University, where her personal success and a strong leadership foundation were formed.

Bolduc was the captain of the Orangewomen for both her junior and senior season, becoming a Northeast All-American in 1999.

Adding to the pressure of being the captain of a major varsity program, she was one of the leaders of Syracuse's inaugural women's lacrosse program. This squad won the 1999 ECAC title in only its second season of existence.

"Leadership was expected," Bolduc said. "We had a lot of underclassmen so it was important to carry on."

Bolduc was also selected to play for the Canadian National Team in 2000.

"We can relate more to her because she was playing college lacrosse not too long ago," sophomore Kristin St. Hilaire said.

At least 97 dead after club blaze

People stare through a fence at the charred wreckage of The Station nightclub yesterday. Ninety-six people were killed in a fire at the West Warwick, R.I., nightclub Thursday night after a pyrotechnic firework caught the club on fire.

By Elizabeth Zuckerman
Associated Press

WEST WARWICK, R.I. – Great White was rocking through its first song, "Desert Moon," and the fans were cheering as fireworks sprayed the stage with sparks. They kept cheering even as flames shot toward the ceiling. Within three minutes, many of them were dead.

At least 97 people died in The Station nightclub on Thursday night, burned or crushed in their frantic fight to escape the old wooden building. Nearly 200 more were injured, 35 critically.

Club officials said they had not given the band permission to use pyrotechnics, a claim echoed by at least four other venues where Great White played in the past month. The band disputed the accusations, and Rhode Island Attorney General Patrick Lynch said authorities were investigating.

Many concertgoers were caught off-guard as they slowly realized the fire wasn't part of the show. Many were badly burned and others were trampled in the rush to escape, in large part through a single door.

"I never knew a place could burn so fast," said Robin Petrarca, 44, who was roughed up in the scramble to escape. She said the smoke was so thick she couldn't see an exit just 5 feet away.

It was the deadliest U.S. nightclub fire since 165 people were killed at the Beverly Hills Supper Club in Southgate, Ky., in 1977. It also came less than a week after 21 people were killed in a stampede at a Chicago nightspot.

The capacity of The Station was 300, but the number of victims and survivors indicated more were inside. The death toll rose steadily Friday as firefighters picked through the smoking ruins of the single-story building.

"This building went up fast – nobody had a chance," said Gov. Don Carcieri, who rushed back to the state from a trip to Florida.

Under the glare of floodlights, a dozen firefighters and other law enforcement officials used rakes to sift through the rubble Friday night as they searched for evidence and belongings of the victims. A corner of the building was still standing, along with the marquee, still advertising Great White's appearance.

Late Friday, the governor said seven of the dead had been identified. No names were released then. At hospitals around the region, anguished relatives pleaded for help in finding loved ones they feared were lost in the club.

Patricia Belanger stood trembling outside Rhode Island Hospital, clutching a photo of her daughter, Dina DeMaio, who was working at the club as a waitress to earn some extra money for herself and her 7-year-old son.

Belanger said she had not been able to find her daughter and was unable to tell her grandson about his mother's possible death.

"He knows his mother didn't come back," she said.

The fire was touched off by pyrotechnics moments after the '80s hard-rock band kicked off its show. A TV cameraman doing a story on nightclub safety recorded the unfolding disaster, beginning with the fireworks, followed seconds later by bright orange flames climbing curtains and soundproofing behind the stage. In moments, the stage was enveloped in a bright yellow haze; among those missing late Friday was guitarist Ty Longley.

Lead singer Jack Russell said he started dousing the fire with a water bottle but couldn't put it out. Then all the lights went out.

"All of a sudden I felt a lot of heat," Russell

Armed robbery in Cashin leads to student arrest

By Dan LaMothe
Collegian Staff

The robbery of a Cashin Hall resident late Thursday night by two men led to the arrest of a University of Massachusetts student after the two fled the scene of the crime.

UMass police received a call from Cashin, a residence hall in the Sylvan living area on campus, at 8:24 p.m. from a resident. After an area search, UMPD forces arrested Young W. Lee, 20, of 9 Muller St. in Tenafly, N.J.

Lee was charged with armed robbery, breaking and entering during the nighttime and being an accessory before the fact to a crime.

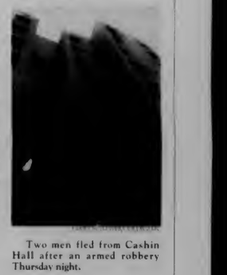
It has not been confirmed yet if the robbery was drug-related, as several of the past armed robberies on campus have been. UMPD spokesman Jim Lyons said that the investigation is still ongoing and that more information would be released as it became available.

"There will be more developments probably reported Monday," Lyons said. "The only reason we're holding back at this point is because we don't want to impede the investigation."

Anyone with information regarding this incident is encouraged to contact UMPD at 545-0893 or call the anonymous TIPS line at 577-8477.

This is the first armed robbery reported this semester at UMass. On Sept. 21, an armed robbery was reported in Coolidge Tower after two men held up a student at gunpoint and instructed him to hand over his valuables. The student reportedly lost $75 in cash in the robbery.

Police subsequently arrested the robbed student, Dustin M. Gaunt, and charged him with possession of a class D substance, marijuana, with intent to distribute.



One of the highest profile robberies in recent years at UMass also occurred in Cashin and ended in a shooting. In 1998, Sukha Chhim of Amherst, then 17, was arrested after an armed robbery led to the wounding of a 24-year-old undergraduate in the residence hall. Chhim was charged with attempted murder, assault with a dangerous weapon and armed robbery.

Police believed that the Cashin shooting was not a random assault, but an isolated incident potentially connected to drug activity.

UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor told the Collegian last semester that she is concerned with the amount of drug activity on campus.

"We've had a number of armed robberies, all drug related," she said in November after a drug bust in Kennedy Tower led to the arrest of two students and the seizure of a large amount of marijuana and $24,000 in cash.

O'Connor said in November that there were six or seven armed robberies last year in addition to the Coolidge robbery early last semester.

Two men fled from Cashin Hall after an armed robbery Thursday night.

Ex-hockey player convicted

A former University of Massachusetts ice hockey player was sentenced to a year in jail Thursday for threatening three people with a knife and confining his ex-girlfriend to a locked room.

Brad Nizwantowski, 22, of Peabody, Mass., was found guilty of kidnapping, assault with a dangerous weapon and two counts of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, according to the Hampshire Gazette. He was also found innocent on a charge of breaking and entering in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony.

Nizwantowski testified in his own defense and waived the right to a trial jury for a Dec. 15, 2001, incident.

According to his own testimony, reported by the Gazette, Nizwantowski went to the Amherst apartment of his ex-girlfriend, Amanda Mentuck, around 2 a.m. that night to find out why she no longer wanted to be in a relationship with him.

Nizwantowski grabbed a knife from the kitchen and, while screaming at Mentuck and her two roommates, threatened to kill himself. He then forced Mentuck into a bedroom and locked the door.

The Gazette reported that Nizwantowski testified that his intention was to talk to Mentuck separately because her roommates were "ganging up" on him.

While the two were in the room, one roommate called the police at the other found two men in the apartment complex to break down the bedroom door. Police forces arrived at about the same time that the men kicked down the door.

"What happened to these young women shouldn't happen to anybody in our society," Hampshire Superior Court Judge Judd Carhart said after delivering the verdict, according to the Gazette, "They were terrorized."

Nizwantowski lost his hockey scholarship as a direct result of the arrest.

Student acknowledged for academics by USA Today

By Nikki Keenan
Collegian Correspondent

USA Today has recently named University of Massachusetts senior Sasha Senderovich to its All-USA College Academic First Team.

Students were chosen for the team based on academics, leadership and activities in which they are involved and were nominated by their schools. Senderovich was one of 20 students selected out of 500 candidates around the country nominated. He received a trophy and a $2500 scholarship for receiving the award.

"It is a great privilege to receive this award because, in part, I see it as a token of acceptance from the country to which my family came as Russian-Jewish immigrants five years ago," Senderovich said.

The University's Office of National Scholarship Advisement (ONSA) nominated Senderovich for the program. He said that he was surprised to learn in January that he had been named.

Senderovich grew up in Russia, where, in addition to attending high school, he received seven years of Russian music education.

At age 15, he received a competitive scholarship called the Freedom Support Act of Exchange, a program created by New York Senator Bill Bradley to support students from the Soviet Union. Senderovich said winning the scholarship is one of his major achievements. He was one of 1000 students chosen for the program, with hundreds of thousands applying. According to Senderovich, the five-month exchange to America and living with an American host family was both an amazing and influential experience for him.

At age 16, Senderovich and his entire family moved to Belmont, Mass., where he completed his last two years of high school. In the fall of 1999, he came to UMass to pursue a double major in comparative literature and Russian and East European studies.

While at UMass, Senderovich has spent a year abroad at Oxford University in England, designed and taught courses at Yale University's Exploration Senior

Eight arrested for terrorist ties

Sami Al-Arian is led in handcuffs to FBI headquarters in Tampa, Fla., Thursday, following his arrest. Al-Arian, a Palestinian college professor previously accused of having terrorist ties, was arrested early Thursday by federal agents.

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Eight people, including four U.S. residents, were charged in a 50-count indictment with supporting, financing and relaying messages for a violent Palestinian terrorist group blamed for the deaths of more than 100 people in and around Israel.

The indictment, returned by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla., was unsealed Thursday. It charges that the men are members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, designated by the United States as a terrorist organization. Among them are a Palestinian professor at the University of South Florida, 45-year-old Sami Amin Al-Arian, who is described as the group's U.S. leader and secretary of its worldwide council.

In Florida, Al-Arian was seen being led in handcuffs to FBI headquarters in Tampa after the arrest.

"It's all about politics," Al-Arian told reporters as agents led him inside.

In announcing the indictment, Attorney General John Ashcroft said the eight supported numerous violent terrorist activities.

"Our message to them and to others like them is clear: We make no distinction between those who carry out terrorist attacks and those who knowingly finance, manage or supervise terrorist organizations," he said.

The indictment charges the eight men with operating a criminal racketeering enterprise since 1984 that supported Palestinian Islamic Jihad and with conspiracy to kill and maim people abroad, conspiracy to provide material support to the group, extortion, perjury and other charges.

Each defendant faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Al-Arian and two others were arrested in Tampa and a fourth man was arrested in Chicago. The other four were living abroad and are not in custody, Ashcroft noted.

The group is described in the indictment as rejecting peaceful solutions to the Palestinian quest for a homeland in the Middle East and with embracing "the Jihad solution and the martyrdom style as the only choice for liberation." The group's purpose, prosecutors allege, is to destroy Israel and end all U.S. and Western influence in the region.

Among the 100 people whose killings are blamed on the organization in Israel and the territories are those of two U.S. citizens: Alisa Flatow, 20, and Shoshana Ben-Yishai,

Club fire kills at least 97

said. "I see the foam's on fire. ... The next thing you know the whole place is in flames."

At least 25 bodies were found near the club's front exit. Fire Chief Charles Hall said some victims were trampled.

"They tried to go out the same way they came in. That was the problem," Hall said. "They didn't use the other three fire exits."

Fire officials said the club had passed a fire inspection Dec. 31, but didn't have a city permit for pyrotechnics. The building, which is at least 60 years old, was not required to have a sprinkler system because of its small size.

The pyrotechnics were used without permission, said Kathleen Hagerty, a lawyer representing club owners Michael and Jeffrey Derderian, who are brothers.

"No permission was ever requested by the band or its agents to use pyrotechnics at The Station, and no permission was ever given," she said.

An unidentified woman carries a bouquet of roses as she approaches The Station nightclub Saturday.

Russell said the band's manager checked with the club before the show and that the use of pyrotechnics was approved. Paul Woolnough, president of Great White's management company, also said tour manager Dan Biechele "always checks" with club officials before pyrotechnics are used. Biechele could not be located for comment.

The owner of a well-known New Jersey nightclub said Great White failed to tell him they were using pyrotechnics for a Valentine's Day show.

"Our stage manager didn't even know it until it was done," said Domenic Santana, owner of the Stone Pony in Asbury Park. "My sound man freaked out because of the heat and everything, and they jeopardized the health and the safety of our patrons."

Concert organizers or their spokesmen also said Great White used pyrotechnics during three other shows – Feb. 7 at the Pinellas Park Expo Center near Tampa, Fla.; Feb. 13 in Allentown, Pa.; and Tuesday in Bangor, Maine – without discussing it with promoters or the venue.

The Rhode Island show was part of a nationwide tour. Officials at other clubs said Great White asked before using pyrotechnics and complied when they were turned down. One of those venues was the Oxygen Nightclub in Evansville, Ind., where the band played Feb. 3.

The club has ceilings 20 feet tall "but we still did not want to take the chance," club owner JJ Parson said. "We said we'd prefer they not, and they went along. Everything we asked them to do, they'd do."

The governor criticized use of the pyrotechnics, saying it was unwise given the age of the building and the low ceilings inside. "I would say that using pyrotechnics inside that building you were asking for trouble," Carcieri said.

Nearly 190 people were taken to hospitals in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, with burns, broken bones and complications from smoke inhalation. The ages of the victims ranged from the teens to the late 30s.

The governor praised rescue workers for their professionalism at the emotional scene.

"Every time they bring someone out, they stop, take off their helmets, with the chaplain and they are praying over each individual person," Carcieri said.

The worst nightclub fire in the United States came on Nov. 28, 1942, when 492 people died at Boston's Cocoanut Grove nightclub when they couldn't get out of blocked and poorly marked exits.

Early Monday, 21 people were killed and more than 50 were injured in the Chicago melee, which began after a security guard used pepper spray to break up a fight. Mourners started burying those victims Friday.

Eight with terrorist ties arrested

16. The killings included suicide bombings, car bombs and drive-by shootings, most recently a June 5, 2002, suicide attack in Haifa, Israel, that killed 20 and injured 50.

Alisa Flatow, then a junior at Brandeis University, died in a 1995 bus bombing in the Gaza Strip. Her father, Stephen Flatow of West Orange, N.J., said Thursday he "thought this would never happen ... This demonstrates the old saw about the wheels of justice – they grind slow, but they grind exceedingly fine."

The defendants allegedly provided financial support through a number of U.S.-based entities, resolved internal conflicts, helped communicate claims of responsibility for terrorist actions and made false statements to immigration officials to help terrorists.

Those arrested in the United States Thursday were described as setting up a terrorist cell at the University of South Florida. They are:

– Al-Arian, the Florida college professor the government says ran the Jihad's U.S. operations. Al-Arian is a native of Kuwait and teaches engineering.

– Sameeh Hammoudeh, 42, born in the West Bank, now a resident of Temple Terrace, Fla. He also is an instructor at the University of South Florida and administrator at the Islamic Academy of Florida.

– Hatim Naji Fariz, 30, born in Puerto Rico and now living in Spring Hill, Fla. He is a manager at a medical clinic.

– Ghassan Zayed Ballut, 41, a West Bank native now living in Tinley Park, Ill., and owner of a small business.

Four men who live abroad were also charged but remained at large:

– Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, 45, a Gaza Strip native and now resident of Damascas, Syria. He is described as the worldwide leader of Palestinian Islamic Jihad and is a former instructor at the University of South Florida.

– Bashir Musa Mohammed Nafi, 50, originally from Egypt and now living in Oxfordshire, England. The indictment calls him the United Kingdom leader of the group.

– Mohammed Tasir Hassan Al-Khatib, 46, originally from the Gaza Strip and now living in Beirut; described as the treasurer of the organization.

– Abd AL Aziz Awda, 52, born in Israel and now imam of the Al Qassam Mosque in Gaza Strip. The indictment calls him the founder and "spiritual leader" of the group.

Al-Arian's criminal attorney, Nicholas Matassini, did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

The office of U.S. Attorney Paul Perez in middle Florida had said last year that Al-Arian was under federal investigation.

"This was disconcerting but not surprising," USF spokesman Michael Reich said of the arrest. He said university President Judy Genshaft will meet with the school's lawyers Thursday to discuss it.

The tenured computer engineering professor was placed on forced leave and banned from campus shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and his subsequent appearance on Fox News Channel. The school also is trying to dismiss him.

He was quizzed about links to known terrorists, and asked about tapes from the late 1980s and early 1990s in which he said "Death to Israel" in Arabic.

Senderovich gave credit to several influential people in his life for his successes, including his great grandmother and mother.

He said that his great grandmother taught him to be persistent and hard-working and his mother began to teach English at age 11.

"I would like to believe that this award is in some way shared by many of my teachers who shaped my ideas, as well as my passion for scholarship and teaching over the years," Senderovich said.

Senderovich said that Yehudit Heller, a professor and honors advisor, is among the people who have inspired him.

"[She inspired] my thinking through our insightful conversations about exile, nostalgia and poetry," he said.

Senderovich plans to attend graduate school and work toward a doctorate while studying Russian Literature, Jewish studies and "memory... among other things."

"I am currently waiting for my decisions from graduate programs in Slavic literatures where I have applied to study at a Ph.D level," he said.

Senderovich has already been accepted to the graduate programs at Berkeley, Columbia and Princeton, and is waiting to hear from Harvard and Stanford.

"UMass is a kind of place where things don't come to one on their own," Senderovich said.

Senderovich offered students advice, saying that they should seek out opportunities offered here at UMass and the other four surrounding colleges.

Club goers should demand more from owners

Last Thursday, a fast-moving fire swept through The Station concert club in West Warwick, R.I. during a Great White concert. The show began around 11 p.m. and video footage shows fireworks igniting the soundproofing behind the stage. Many concertgoers confused the fire with the pyrotechnics, which were part of the show.

Within three minutes, the club's wooden structure was entirely engulfed in flames. There were 96 victims of this fire. One hundred eighty-seven people were treated for injuries, including serious burns and smoke inhalation.

State Attorney General Patrick Lynch said Friday that the authorities were still investigating and wouldn't speculate on the type of charges that might be brought forth. Since the fire, there have been disputes about the use of pyrotechnics during the show. Spokespeople for the band have claimed that they received full permission to have pyrotechnics while the club owners say that the request for their usage had never even been made.

The concert was part of Great White's nationwide tour. Four other venues that hosted Great White earlier this year claim that the band had also used pyrotechnics without their permission.

This accident comes on the heels of another fatal nightclub accident that took place Feb. 17, when 21 people were killed in stampede in a Chicago, Ill. nightclub.

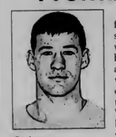
Interestingly, one of the nightclubs was in full compliance with the law. The Station passed a fire safety inspection at the end of December (though authorities are fairly certain that the club was over its limit for people last Thursday). The Chicago club E2 was operating illegally. The club's owners were ordered by the city last summer to close down the second-floor nightclub because of 11 code violations.

These two venues are places that college-aged students and young adults used to frequent. These situations could've happened at any club, and are probably places that we, as UMass students, have encountered before. Small spaces, low ceilings and little ventilation in clubs are not uncommon in places where students go to see shows and party.

These conditions seem unavoidable. We've come to consider these conditions as acceptable and consider it as part of the experience, no matter how unsavory it is as times.

It shouldn't be acceptable.

It shouldn't take tragedies like these to call for more safety pre-cautions for nightclubs, when they already seem so obvious. One of the worst nightclub fires in U.S. history took place in Boston. The Thanksgiving Day fire at the Cocoanut Grove Club in 1942 claimed the lives of 492 people. The front doors were stuck, trapping the majority of the victims; today most places have regular doors in addition to revolving doors.



As consumers, we are the ones that pay the cover charges, buy the alcohol and the tickets. We should be demanding more of owners to ensure not only a good time, but a safe time should things go awry.

Prohibition doesn't solve anything

Robert Carey

I had a fat friend in grade school. He was very open with his corpulence and he'd often vocalize his envy of my thin physique. What vexed him the most was that my house was always filled with freshly baked cookies, ice cream and assorted Hostess products. At his house, the closest things to junk food were ginger cookies or, sometimes, stale Fig Newtons.

His obesity even had me confused until I noticed after a few visits to my house that there was always a sudden disappearance of junk food left in the wake of his visit, to the extent that even my mother remarked on it. As our friendship continued, there was always something of an insistence that we go to my house to play, and if I declined, his insistence would often turn to pleading.

Later it dawned on me that my friend lived his childhood in an environment where eating junk food was prohibited. So when he was put into an environment where that was no longer the case, he'd gorge himself freely, normally at the expense of my family's grocery bill. He became a by-product of backfired preventive methods. But it's too late for him; his childhood eating habits have, in all likelihood, condemned him to a shortened life of obesity.

Recently, I turned 21. At last the earth had completed 21 revolutions around the sun since the time of my birth, and the United States government finally granted me the right to drink. I felt liberated. Finally, I could walk into any corner store, packy or bar I wanted to, and know my presence would be warmly welcomed with the alcoholic purchase of my choice. I ran through the long aisles of Liquors 44 wanting to imbibe all the strange new bottled liquor I had never had the legal right to buy before. I wanted to purchase the rare imported beer that I had never known existed on the shelves of this fine store. I was like a kid in a candy shop. A fat kid?

Suddenly, I realized I had to control myself. Twenty-one is a popular age for people to become an alcoholic, begin to frequently drive drunk, and suffer the consequences of their own intemperance. I wanted to make sure that berserk celebration didn't turn into a regrettable addiction or some unfortunate mishap.

I took time to ponder the stupidity of the legal drinking age. I'm sure many people, after turning 21, end up like my Twinkie-digesting friend, and live the rest of their lives constantly binging on a thing they never learned to handle at an earlier age.

> "In my opinion this is the primary reason behind the uncontrollably high number of addicts and overdoses in this country."

In the U.S., the idea that prohibition is a successful method of keeping people from dealing with substances that might be of potential danger to them has a long and humiliating history. In 1921, with women finally given the opportunity to vote, they decided to wield their newfound democratic power in confounding and detrimental ways. New to the democratic process, leagues of women voters sprang up from the kitchens and nurseries to throw their whole-hearted support for the prohibition of alcohol. Much to the protest of men, politicians looking to milk the new demographic of voters supported the women. This ushered in a time of incredible violence.

With an illegal commodity in high demand, organized crime quickly formed to slake the thirsty mouths of those unable to live without their mint juleps and frosty lager. When prohibition was repealed in 1933, the organized crime stayed. Needing a new product, they turned to other illegal, mind-altering substances like marijuana, opiates and cocaine. The American public acted in familiar fashion and pushed its political representatives for prohibitive laws against the use of these substances, thus feeding into the mobsters' hands.

Today, the view hasn't changed much. Unlike other western countries that have noted the frivolousness in trying to prevent people from doing things that they will ultimately do anyway, the American public has been slow to see it like that. In my opinion, this is the primary reason behind the uncontrollably high number of addicts and overdoses in this country. It's time for the American ideology to shift from penalization and prevention to education. In this way we may have fewer drunks, fat kids and misinformed voters.

Night club safety a responsibility of everyone

"It was one of those situations you wish you could've done more" – Brian Butler Photojournalist for WPRI Channel 12 in Providence.

Last Friday blasted my life through a series of horrible emotions as I sat in my house watching nonstop news coverage of the awful club fire at The Station in Warwick, R.I. Amidst all of the horror and abhorrent sensations, I couldn't help but incorporate my own experiences into the tragedy.

Ironically, more than anything this horrific event shifted me back to college. As many upperclassmen could probably tell you, I spent four years working for this newspaper. Throughout the course of my life it has been determined that those years will be my sole exposure to the journalism world. However, out of all of my life experiences, those four years dominated the majority of my emotions surrounding the fire.

Working behind the scenes at hundreds of concerts and other live events has both strongly influenced and warped my perception on what exactly takes place. As a reporter, you see everything at a concert. You see bands setting up. You see bands closing the stage down. You see artists smoking pot in the dressing room while arguing with the venue promoters that there aren't enough bottles of Cristal champagne for each member of the crew to get his or her own. You see fights in the crowd behind you. You see people get trampled, punched, kicked, stabbed, spit on, urinated on, puked on, and thrown out. At a good majority of shows (especially those in tiny, hole-in-the wall clubs) most people are drunk, high or worse. Many times people are looking for fights. I often remember standing on the right side of the stage just observing the violent mosh pits in a sort of admiring way as you might view a no-hitter at a baseball game.

And, all the while as the journalist, you usually aren't involved. You just kind of sit back and take in how truly trapped among a fury of ruthless animals you are with no viable way out if you want to leave. You're really the only non-player in the concert game because you're not in the band, you're not a fan in the crowd, and you're not an employee of the club. You're just there to witness what is going on.

After watching hours of news reports last Friday, I realized how many tiny venues I've tightly packed myself into and thought, "Wow, if this thing goes up, I'm dead."

They said that no one last Thursday night took note of any of the possible fire exits, or escape routes – precautions that would've saved lives. Some law officials then went on to say that no one ever takes notes of these things. Well, trust me, those law officials are wrong. The amount of times I used to notice the atrocious environment of a tiny club is phenomenal. Any normal human being who walks into a place like that will immediately see that the walls are decrepit and filled with holes, and the ceiling is so low that you probably will hit your head if you start bouncing up and down.

Ryan Benharris

You automatically look for any sign of cleanliness and safety, but there never is one. There's no way you can walk into a tiny box like that, and not think, "Wow, this place is dangerous." But you ignore it, simply because you can chalk it up as part of the experience of seeing a rock and roll band.

Then I started to wonder what kind of insane person has a thought like that, and completely ignores it. There's something wrong with that. I remember joking with Collegian coworkers about the size of venues we attended. I even remember a coworker returning from a rock club in Attleboro, Mass. who said the entrance door to the club was so small and impossible to find that he was sure he wasn't in the right place. He said to get into the venue you had to knock on an enormous heavy hidden metal door and some guy would open it and let you in. Upon entrance he said the place was filled to capacity. And this place, just like The Station in Warwick, Rhode Island attracted many rising national acts.

Even more troubling about my years as a Collegian concert reporter was when I was a photographer. I'm willing to bet that more than 90 percent of people don't know anything about being a concert photographer. Quite basically, you take your camera, photo-pass and then you pack yourself into a five-foot wide space in front of the crowd, just big enough to kneel and take a picture. You get pushed by the people behind you. You get landed on by crowd surfers. You get hit by things people are throwing at the stage. One false move and you're being punched, kicked and grabbed by a security guard. I even recall a Collegian photographer spraining his fingers after Creed's Scott Stapp stepped on his hand. Being a photographer is a dangerous, scary thing. Not only because of what you see, but also because of where you are, and how little freedom you have to get out if you need to.

I started to envision specifics about covering a concert, especially at small venues. One time I was shooting Nickelback in Northampton. Unlike some of the major venues such as the Mullins Center and Fleetcenter, smaller clubs will often neglect to fence off the press area. A photographer has to walk in front of the crowd, and shoot directly in front of the stage with no protective barrier behind him/her. At this particular club a fight broke out right next to me. I tried desperately to escape, but it was utterly hopeless. Being in the middle of a fight, I had already taken several blows to the head, and all I could do was try to cower under the crowd to try to protect my camera from being dropped or destroyed. It was only until several minutes after the fight had erupted that I was able to clear my own way to safety, clean myself off and go home.

> "I cannot even begin to recount how many tiny venues I've tightly packed myself into and thought, 'Wow, if this piece goes up, I'm dead.'"

This brings me to the quote I opened with from the WPRI videographer. Butler happened to be in The Station club last Thursday night because, ironically, the television station sent him there to get concert footage for a special report they were doing on safety in small clubs, in the wake of the Chicago stampede tragedy earlier this month. He ended up videotaping the entire fiery scene. In this expression, Butler perfectly described the typical feeling of a concert photographer. A lot of times you're in the middle of messes that could be potentially life threatening, and you just wish there was something you could do to stop it.

The photographer gets to see things, sometimes long before anyone else, and often can predict what will happen later. I've had this feeling every time I've seen a 15-year-old pressed against the front of the crowd at a Limp Bizkit concert before the band takes the stage, only to think to myself, "When they come out here, that kid's gonna get hurt," only to watch the kid get pulled away on a stretcher later on.

The sad reality in Butler's sentiment is that, you really can't do anything. With all the idiotic and awful decisions set in place (whether it be by the band or the club, it doesn't matter) last Thursday night, aside from luck, there was no way to escape from that building, no matter how much help you got from anyone.

And that's the awful truth. For every single one of those concerts I covered for the Collegian in my four years as an employee, I would've died had this tragedy taken place.

Unquestionably.

Worst of all, I knew that at every building I walked into, and I wholeheartedly acknowledged it in every single case.

It's definitely time for the attitude that it's all part of the fun to stop. There needs to now be a massive wave of change in the way small-venue concerts are operated. That revolution can only happen if concert goers spark it. If you've paid ten, twenty or even thirty dollars to go to a club show, you have a right to your own personal safety to ask a club owner, upon entering the building, "What do I do if there's an emergency situation." If the exits aren't clearly marked, say something. If they give you a hassle about your questions and refuse to answer them, then leave. Getting hurt (or worse) just to have a few drinks and see a band you like isn't worth it.

Brian Butler is absolutely right. I look back on what happened at The Station, and I can only hopelessly think to myself, "I wish I could've done more." Had I done all of these things I'm pleading to you readers to do now, who knows how much change would've taken place?

I don't need to say that it's a horrible situation that should never happen again, but I will, because the situation is a necessary and all-too familiar one that got way out of hand.

Turning down the volume

Van Meter dormitory was once part of an "arts cluster." While other buildings have lounges to study in, Van Meter has a stage and performance center in its basement.

During the week and on Saturdays, the area is a facility for bands to practice in. Events like yoga workshops, group meetings and the Van Meter Koffee Haus also take advantage of the space on a regular basis. It's a fantastic space, and Van Meter, primarily due to its regular Koffee Haus shows, has invested in track lighting and a rather impressive collection of amplifiers, speakers and lights that performance groups can rent out from the cluster office.

There is one problem. The area is not soundproofed in any way. Above it is the entrance lounge to Van Meter, a place where students study or congregate. Above that are five more floors of student dorm rooms. The first three floors, especially those in the building's central corridors, can hear and feel the deafening, repetitive (remember they are practicing) sounds of hard metal rock and feel the vibration through their entire being. This happens for a few hours each day when the bands are allowed to practice.

After complaints were made to the resident director and area resident director last semester, the band's practice hours began to be strictly restricted to a few hours a day: Monday through Friday bands may practice 4-6 p.m., on Saturday they have 2-6 p.m., and no practice is allowed on Sunday. Relieved residents actually grouped together and thanked the directors via memo. However, this semester, those same students, including myself, have come to wonder why we should have to put up with the ruckus at all.

As residents, we pay to live in Van Meter and should therefore be afforded a certain amount of input into what kind of atmosphere we would like our building (our homes) to have. We all understand that dormitory life is noisy and often challenging to those who wish to pursue any kind of real focused work in general, but are frustrated by the sometimes constant stream of unavoidable, obnoxious, and overwhelming noise and distraction swelling from beneath us. For disrupted residents, it becomes difficult to remain pleasant, let alone tolerant or focused when you've been awoken from an afternoon nap by the deafening beat of a metal drummer vibrating through the floor and into your bed.

However, residents also understand that they are not living on a quiet floor or area. It's important to have the basement area for practices and events like Koffee Haus. Residents and staff are usually quite grateful and excited to participate in, and have these opportunities available – it is only when they become distractions to our vital work as students and people that tempers will flare.

S.J. Port

While the upper floors and far ends of the north and south wings of the building do not feel the noise as often as those on the first three floors many outside the building are affected. Complaints have been made by the two dorms below Van Meter – Greenough and Chadbourne. The band may practice in what is considered the basement, but the basement is actually the ground floor on the back of the building. The area in which they practice has large windows facing out the back of the building looking down upon the rest of Central. The noise outside will ruin a sunny spring day, and cause confusion and hearing damage for those walking by or up the hill after classes.

Why should these bands be allowed to use a facility that disrupts so many people? The decibel level is outrageous. If any resident played their music, or practiced in their room at the decibel level these bands use they would be written up for noise violations instantly. Done repetitively the student would be asked to leave the building. Supposed "courtesy hours" are in effect whenever it is not quiet hours, so why doesn't this apply to those using the facility?

> "If any resident played their music, or practiced in their room at the decibel level these bands use they would be written up for noise violations instantly."

For those of us surrounded by the band's inescapable noise, we suffer headaches, lost naptimes, and most importantly, the complete inability to be productive academically during their practice sessions. Even with earplugs on or headphones on the bands can still be heard and felt by residents on the basement, first and second floors. Why should we be subjected in our homes to inescapable noise, which we do not create or approve of?

Students set their schedules according to many factors, but should somebody else's loud and disruptive band practice be added to that list of factors? I refuse to accept the bands as one of my factors. In any other paid place of residence, this level of noise and disruption would not be tolerated. So why are we as students asked to do so? We accept enough noise living in dorms, but this pushes that too far.

The bands need to go. They can find someplace else to practice, where they aren't disturbing so many lives. I want to be able to study, rest or hold a conversation in my room whenever I want. And I do not want my sunny days on the hill ruined by the massive ear-piercing sound generated by a small group in the basement. It is time for the noise to end, or for Van Meter to sound proof the area.

Nora Jones garners eight awards

Springsteen and Dixie Chicks win three at 74th Annual Grammy Awards

By Nekesa Mumbi Moody
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – The music of pop-jazz chanteuse Norah Jones garnered eight Grammy awards Sunday night, catapulting her past crowd favorite Bruce Springsteen and his three awards for the Sept. 11-inspired "The Rising."

As unknown as Springsteen was acclaimed before the last year, Jones won four individual Grammys while her producer, engineers and the writer of her hit "Don't Know Why" were honored as well.

"I never ever thought that the music I made would become popular music, so this is amazing," Jones said as she picked up an award for best pop vocal album. She also won for best female pop vocal, best new artist and for record of the year for "Don't Know Why," written by Jesse Harris, who won the song of the year Grammy.

Her album, "Come Away With Me," earned best engineered album and producer of the year honors for Arif Mardin.

The 23-year-old New Yorker, who emerged last year from obscurity after signing with the tiny Blue Note label, sold more than 6 million copies of her debut worldwide. She appeared almost overwhelmed in accepting one award from the Queen of Soul, Aretha Franklin.

Harris, who thanked Jones for "being a pal," said backstage that he thought for certain Bruce was going to win.

Springsteen was clearly a favorite of the crowd inside Madison Square Garden as the Grammys returned to New York for the first time in five years.

Performing only a few miles north of ground zero, Springsteen delivered a rousing performance of the title track midway through the 45th annual award as the crowd screamed, "Bruuuuce!!!!"

The Dixie Chicks, after a bitter legal battle with their label Sony, took best country album among their three Grammys. The trio's multiplatinum "Home," a return to their country roots, was co-produced by member Natalie Maines' father, Lloyd.

"I want to check the record books and see how many fathers and daughters have won Grammys together," she said, grabbing her father.

Among the double winners were Eminem, Coldplay, India.Arie and Nelly. Eminem's second Grammy came for best rap album, the third time he's won in the category.

Instead of offering an acceptance speech, Eminem rattled off a list of rappers who had inspired him, including Run-DMC, LL Cool J, Tupac Shakur and the Notorious B.I.G.

"Thank you, because I learned from all of you," he said.

The show opened with Dustin Hoffman, one in a revolving series of New York-based hosts, introducing lifetime achievement award winners Simon and Garfunkel.

The televised ceremony opened with the Simon and Garfunkel reunion. The pair, who sang "The Sound of Silence," have shared a tumultuous relationship; this was their first performance together in a decade.

Hoffman, before exiting, provided two gaffes. He mispronounced the Boss' name

Exploring your options during a pregnancy

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Q: I just found out I'm pregnant, and I still have two years left in school. I never really thought about having a baby or getting an abortion before. What are my options?

A: You can go to Tapestry Health (413-548-9992), University Health Services (413-577-5101) or Planned Parenthood (413-732-1620 or 1-800-642-5665) for counseling options and help deciding what way to go is best for you. All of these places will probably want to give you a urine test to be sure you are pregnant, unless you have already been tested at a hospital or clinic.

Sex-iversity

Sara Brumfield & Winnie Chen

You face a difficult decision, but there are people that can help you decide whether or not you want to raise the child, consider adoption or abortion. If you are considering adoption, there are several options, one of which is placing your child through a public or private agency that is licensed by the government. There is also independent adoption through a doctor or lawyer or someone else that knows a couple that wants to adopt. You may also consider adoption by relatives or foster care. For information about agency adoption, you can contact The National Adoption Information Clearinghouse for a referral for agencies in your area at 1-888-251-0075 (http://www.calib.com/naic) or the Independent Adoption Center hotline at 1-800-877-6736 (http://www.adoptionhelp.org.) Information on these services can also be found at places like Tapestry Health, UHS and Planned Parenthood.

If you do decide to have an abortion, Planned Parenthood in Springfield is the closest clinic that provides abortion services. Planned Parenthood recently moved into a new facility with highly trained staff and resources. If funding may be a problem, non-profit organizations like the Abortion Rights Fund of Western Massachusetts (1-800-450-6000) can provide direct financial assistance for abortions.

If you decide you want to raise the child, there is University Child Day Care and assistance programs and options provided by Tapestry Health, UHS and Planned Parenthood. Their consultation is best to get advice and see an options counselor about what will be best for you.

Know whatever you decide is your choice and there is no wrong answer. Just know there are people out there who want to help and give you support in whatever you choose to do.

Some information in this article came from Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts and affiliates.

Hip hop group making a name in the Pioneer Valley

By Justin Chellman
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – Billed as the "Creative Differences Tour," the Living Legends, an underground family with nine members – making them sort of an underground hip hop version of Wu Tang – have set out through the United States playing venues in the specific request of their fans.

In order for the Legends to make a stop near you, one of the members, Luckyiam.PSC, had fans e-mail him the local spots they wanted him and his crew to perform at. The 15th stop (would have been the 15th stop, but two dates were canceled due to the snow storm) was Northampton, a place that has grown a reputation for its support of underground hip hop acts.

"Creative Differences" is the name of the not yet finished album the Living Legends plan to release later this year. The tour, which included the up and coming Eyedea and Abilities and the West Coast local talent 2Mex and Busdriver, is actually a promotional tour for the groups themselves, wanting to get their names known to fans and get the word out about their new albums.

Living Legends with Eyedea and Abilities and 2Mex and Busdriver
Pearl Street
Feb. 19

The Living Legends will release an album soon, but as individuals, have a whole slew of new materials to release into the general population. The Grouch, the group's member with an at times pessimistic but real persona, has a new album, as does both the abstract but ingenious Eligh. Fellow band member MURS (who was missing in action during the show) also has a new album coming out on the up and coming label, Def Jux, headed by dirt hop innovator, El-P.

The Living Legends profess the way they make themselves grow is by word of mouth. In order to achieve this, they must rip every show as if it was the last they'll ever do. The Living Legends are an independent group in the truest sense of the word. They are unsigned and release all their music themselves. This leaves all the promoting up to them as well, so the group must tour. A lot. In order for the touring to be effective, every show must be tight. The same goes for the under cards Eyedea & Abilities and 2Mex & Busdriver.

From the onset, this show was banging. Before you even knew the show had started, the whole place was already jumping with the speed demon mic wizardry of Busdriver and 2Mex and their live band. They mixed hip hop with Ska and hardcore punk, weaving in and out through hardcore bangers to trippy, offkey rock songs that, as one of the band members said, made you feel like you were on I.S.D. When they left, the stage people flocked to their booth to pick up albums from these new guys in town that they had never heard before.

Onto Act II. Eyedea & Abilities were the most well known of all the acts featured that night, due to their association with Atmosphere and with Eyedea winning a N.Y. blaze battle. This was deejaying and emceeing at it's best. It was hard to decide who was the more dominate, Eyedea's incredible, ego laced wordplay or Abilities sick turntablism. Whichever you decide, it was a great combination, especially when Abilities would scratch certain pitches and speeds and then Eyedea would attempt to drop rhyme in that same tempo.

Already wowed by the opening performances, the crowd was then called into action again, when the seven legends got on stage and began to each rip mics and jump around on stage (with exception of Grouch and Eligh, who prefer the subtle approach of chilling in the back until their verses). Each legend traded mics with one another, as they went through various solo tracks and crew cuts, playing the old with the new. The loudest two of the crew, Asop and Sunspot, did the introductions. Later, PSC crooned his mellow approach, and Bicasso came with his alternative but still hard style.

The tightest flow of the night was Legends member Scarub's rendition of "Savvy Traveler." He got right up to the edge of the stage, jumping around and moving his arms about to the beat, as well as inflecting his voice with his uniquely accented style.

Famed hypnotist lulls UMass into his trance

By Christine Papazidis
Collegian Staff

Frank Santos returned to the UMass Fine Arts Center's packed house Wednesday night for another dose of his popular X-rated hypnotism show, filling the house with skeptical audience members who doubted his "hypnotism" act.

Santos, who delivered his show at UMass last year as well, began by asking for 15 females and 15 males to volunteer and be hypnotized. As the numbers dwindled down to about 12 participants, Santos began his comical and sexual acts of hypnotism.

Frank Santos
Fine Arts Center
Feb. 19

According to the Webster's New World Dictionary, hypnosis is "a trancelike condition usually induced by another person, in which the subject responds to the suggestions of the hypnotist." According to Frank Santos, "It will feel like a nice long nap."

Throughout the show, Santos had the participants under a deep sleep, having them perform all sorts of sexual acts (cleanly) with themselves or with the others. At one point, Santos brought out a Simpsons doll, which he explained was a "voodoo" doll. Anything he did to the doll, the participants would do and or feel. Santos went from hitting the doll on the head with the microphone to waving its arm to having it imply sexual actions.

He had one of his participants pretend he was Michael Jackson singing "Beat It," complete with dancing, singing and the famous Jackson moves. Of course, the unforgettable scene of two males participating in a sex scene with a Pamela Anderson blow up doll was the most comical part of the show; the whole audience roared in uncontrollable laughter.

David Paek, a senior economics major, was one such participant hypnotized by Santos and says he remembers "bits and pieces."

"I felt drugged the whole time and like my body was totally powerless," Paek said.

At one point, Santos told two of the female participants they were going to play Monica Lewinsky for the night and have a lollypop-sucking contest. Santos then continued to tell the hypnotized members they would feel everything the girls were doing to their lollypop.

"I definitely did feel sexually aroused," Paek said. "It was weird."

Throughout the show, Santos kept having Paek perform things with this blow up doll. Unfortunately, he does not remember a thing and laughed as soon as he was filled in on what he had done. Paek said he was not into the event at first, but once Santos' lulling voice had them placed in an elevator and told them they would be falling 34 floors and going deeper and deeper into sleep, Paek said, "My body just got wicked tired, and my heart rate slowed down."

The hypnotized people did not react to any of the other participants actions. No laughing. No expressions. Nothing. Paek says he does not remember what any of the other people did at all – only bits and pieces if someone or something jogs his memory.

Frank Santos can be seen every Thursday night in Boston at the Comedy Connection in Faneuil Hall.

Game Two; Round One

Six degrees of Kevin Bacon

Lack of in-depth lyrics don't measure up to a great beat

Swizz Beatz tries to showcas his talent for crafting unique songs

By DAVID PESSAH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Swizz Beatz introduced us to his unique production style on the DMX masterpiece, "Ruff Ryder's Anthem." With highly synthesized, jumpy beats, songs like "Party Up," "Iggga My Nigga" and "Down Bottom" helped propel the upstart rapper. On "G.H.E.T.T.O Stories," Swizz attempts to further showcase his talent for crafting unique songs that will make you nod your head. Unfortunately, you will only nod to the beat. The lyrics fail to rise to the quality of Swizz's production.

It takes a certain type of emcee to flow over Swizz's backgrounds. DMX could. Drag-On did it with ease. Unfortunately, neither appears on this album, and the rappers that do show up fail to produce a decent flow or even make a vocal impact over his banging keyboards. This compilation is purely a showcase for Swizz's production talent, with an abundance of throw away verses fellow artists contributed to support him.

After "The Start," an introduction, Swizz proceeds to tell us his "Ghetto Stories." This track, the only one in which he rhymes alone, has a beat that fits his flow exactly, but the lyrics fail to live up to the title. There are no actual stories told here – just boring "I love the hood" and "I'm better than you" bragging that anybody with an inferiority complex can write to make them feel better. We do get one underlying message though throughout this song: Swizz "got beats galore."

There are exceptions, most notably the hit "Good Times," featuring Styles P. Credit to this song is that it does have a solo subject matter – one most of the songs on this album lack – even if it is simplistic hook, head-nodding beat and Styles' strong verses, this song is not one to overlook.

The last time we heard of Lil' Kim, she was asking us "how mam licks does it take?" Well now she's back, spitting on the track "Gone Delirious," proclaiming that it's "the return of the widow/ it's goin' down kiddo." Here Kim tells us just what she's been doing since we last heard from her, which seems to consist of rollin' "Holly-Hood style getting' love around the globe." Kim has reason to brag though: "Gone Delerious" is one of the best songs on this album.

There are many big names on this disc, with rappers like Noreaga, Snoop Dogg, Jadakiss and Lil Cool J; there's probably at least one song here for most hip hop fans to hit the repeat button. Eve and Swizz team up nicely on "Island Spice," where Swizz presents Eve with the kind of Caribbean groove she continuously shines on. The biggest disaster on this CD is the combination of Metallica and Ja Rule on "We Did It." This song, an abundance of incoherent noise, not only doesn't fit on this album, but doesn't fit in anyone's music collection.

For "G.H.E.T.T.O. Stories," Swizz expanded his scope and invited an array of talent to rhyme over his beats. Ironically, it's the artists from back at Ruff Ryders who shine most. Eve, Styles and Jadadiss step up to the plate, but we are left wondering what prevented DMX and Drag-On from contributing and maybe providing at least another songs to fast-forward to instead of past.

If you're looking for an album of thought provoking or focused lyrics, you will not find it here. If you're just looking for something to party to or to put on when you're doing something else, you will find yourself nodding your head.

'G.H.E.T.T.O. Stories' features artists Lil' Kim, P. Diddy, Snoop Dogg, Eve, LL Cool J and many more.

Last night's Grammy award winners

as "Springsteet," and introduced No Doubt by singing "Say Baby," their hit is "Hey Baby."

Timmen, Jones, Springsteen and Nelly were all nominated for a leading five Grammys apiece, along with perennial Grammy favorite Sheryl Crow, neosoul singer songwriter Raphael Saadiq, teen rocker Avril Lavigne and R&B newcomer Ashanti. Saadiq, Crow and Ashanti all won one.

Country singer Alan Jackson, who wrote "Where Were You (When the World Stopped Turning)" in the weeks after the terrorist attacks, won best country song for the mournful tune.

India Arie, who was nominated for seven Grammys last year but lost them all, finally got her first two, winning for best urban-alternative performance for "Little Things" and best R&B album for "Voyage to India."

Among the other winners: the previously unheralded Funk Brothers. The groundbreaking house band for Motown Records, the focus of the recent documentary "Standing in the Shadows of Motown," won two trophies.

Some other veteran artists added to bulging trophy cases: bluesman B.B. King won two, for 15 in his career, while Johnny Cash won his 11th and Tony Bennett his 10th – while soul legend Solomon Burke won his first.

"We got a Grammy, baby!" Burke said as he hoisted his Grammy.

The disc "Vaughn Williams: A Sea Symphony" garnered three awards, including best classical album.

Missy Elliott won Best Female Rap Solo Performance for 'Scream A.K.A. Itchin.'

The Living Legends reach Northampton

But all shined in their own way whether it was Eligh showcasing his new songs or Sunspot's craziness and on stage theatrics. The crowd was alive with die-hard fans singing along with the crew and throwing up their "L's." Then, their new fans brought along for the ride enticed by the electricity.

By the end of the night, everyone was charged and exhausted. The Legends invited all the ladies on stage and played one of their more danceable tunes. During this, you could see all of the different personalities on stage unfold. Eligh, the self proclaimed hermit, stood in back away from the ladies behind the turntables, and Grouch (who is married) stood to the side emceeing but not mingling. The other single and wilder members of the crew Sunspot, Asop, Biecasso and the ladies man PSC) got right up dancing with the girls, as PSC set out on his mission giving certain ladies eye to eye serenades.

Now with guys in the audience thoroughly hating now, Asop got all the ladies off stage (not before PSC reminded them all that there will be an after party) and apologized, saying "I know what y'all are saying, f those girls and the Legends ain't st. I know. I feel you. If a group did that in my town, I'd be like that too." To make up for it, the Legends killed it with some more hot tracks like the favorite "Rabbit Hole," off of the last crew album "Almost Famous," before finally calling it quits and drenched with sweat left the stage and headed out to their booth to sell albums to the large crowd of fans waiting to get their hands on some of the magic they just heard.

Overall, the show was incredible exactly what you want to experience when you head out to a hip hop show. Unfortunately, the Living Legends road manager said the Legends might not be coming around the area for a while, because the cost was high and some of the other shows out here on the east coast didn't have the turnouts they were hoping for.

Hopefully, more people will start to listen to the Living Legends and support the independent crew's music, so they will be able to come to the Pioneer Valley once again, because it definitely is hip hop at its finest. One of the only ways to familiarize yourself with the crew in this area is to check the web site http://www.llcrew.com, as distribution of their records are very scarce on the east coast.

Nearing a creative crossroad

Supergrass makes strides with album

By JUSTIN MARQUES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While many popular Brit-pop bands, like Oasis for instance, seem to appear like they've been creatively slowing down, Supergrass is headed toward a creative crossroad with its new release, "Life on Other Planets."

From its first album in 1994, "I Should Coco," to its current album, Supergrass has progressed from a chaotic, youthful high-energy sound to develop a more mature presence, driven more by melody. Supergrass' fourth album shows the progression of the band over the years, displaying its many (possibly too many) influences. However, the group doesn't forget its rocking roots.

Much of the energy displayed on its first album could have been attributed to the use of keyboards, courtesy of Rob Coombes. Sadly, even though Rob Coombes is the brother of lead singer Gaz Coombes, he didn't play a major role on the band's other albums. Rob was used mostly as a touring keyboardist, but when Gaz went back to the studio for "Life on Other Planets," he decided to give his brother official member status.

Usually when a band adds a new member to their group, chaos can ensue. In this case, however, Rob fits perfectly. He pounds the ivory and black on "Za," the album's beginning, and closes the CD with spacey, psychedelic synthesizer effects on "Run."

Supergrass
'Life on Other Planets'
Island Records

Still, the group is missing a crucial element to tie the entire album together into a cohesive unit, but who needs that when you've got 12 great pop rock songs? For this and other reasons, it can be difficult to take Supergrass seriously. They are, by reputation, a playful band. On "Za," Gaz Coombes states his need for some fun lovemaking, "Face, such a beautiful face, why don't we get it on," and adds to the frivolous tone. Adding to such an attitude, the album features chirping birds, munchkin choirs, noisy sheep and an Elvis impersonator, making an audience leery to consider its merit. Thus, most Americans, since Supergrass' first release eight years ago, have managed to not take them seriously, nor have they paid any attention to them at all. Hopefully, after listening to "Life on Other Planets" or LOOP, as the album is referred to, people will begin to take some notice.

As for the band's influences, there are many, starting of course with T. Rex and working its way from the Beatles to the Kinks, as well as a mesh of popular 70s rock (Paul McCartney, ELO, David Bowie) to even some punk and ska (most notably the Buzzcocks). While these influences create a wonderfully diverse sound, they also make "Life on Other Planets" lose some direction. The song "Profit 15" sounds like something McCartney would love to have had on his Wings set list. The album's title is actually taken from the 70s era synthesizer sound used to create many of the album's spacey effects. "Rush Hour Soul," and "Za" channel much furious energy from popular glam band T. Rex. "Brecon Beacon" shows the band's ska side. With the album clocking in at only 41 minutes, the listener is hit with all these influences in one quick rush.

In the end, "Life on Other Planets" is a very good album. It's not great or a classic, but Supergrass is getting there. "Life on Other Planets" is a stepping-stone toward the creation of something great. Hopefully, some people in the States will take notice and look forward to its next offering in the future.

LECTURES

SOUTH HADLEY – Today at 7 p.m., the Odyssey Bookshop will host a reading by Kenyon Review editor David H. Lynn, from his novel "Wrestling with Gabriel." On Tuesday, Feb. 25, the Odyssey will host a reading by the Chinese writer Da Chen, who will read from "Sounds of the River," the sequel to his memoir, "Colors of the Mountain," at 7 p.m. Both events are free and open to the public.

NORTHAMPTON – On Tuesday, the Broadside Bookshop will host a reading and signing with Scott R. Chapman. Chapman will read and sign his new novel "Leaves of Red and Gold: The Journey of Matthew Schipani," the political thriller that follows the career of Matthew Schipani, the first gay Attorney General of Massachusetts. This event is free and open to the public.

MUSIC

NORTHAMPTON – The Smith College Music Department presents an evening of jazz music by the Grammy-nominated David Sanchez sextet. The performance is the first of the Marsalis Jams events. Marsalis Jams is a jazz education program, created by Branford Marsalis. The program brings professional jazz musicians to college campuses to meet individually with student musicians and present a public concert, complete with jam session. The performance will be held at the Sweeney Concert Hall on the Smith College campus at 8 p.m. A discussion with the musicians will follow on Thursday, Feb. 27 in the Earle Recital Hall, Sage Hall, at 4 p.m. Both events are free and open to the public.

NORTHAMPTON – The Magic Triangle Jazz Series, produced by 91.1 FM WMUA and the Residential Program of the Fine Arts, presents Alan Silva and the Celestrial Communication Orchestra on Thursday, Feb. 27, at Helen Hills Chapel, Elm Street, Smith College at 8 p.m. The 19-piece orchestra will feature Leena Conquest, Perry Robinson, Marshall Allen, Ismeel Moondoc, Steve Swell, Bill Lowe, Joe Daley, William Parker, Joe Morris, Jackson Krall and Laurence Cook. Tickets are $7 for students and $12 for the general public and are available through the Fine Arts Center Box Office, (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-900-UMAS.

THEATER

AMHERST – "Revelence," a play written and directed by Louai Abu-Osba, is considered a collaboratively designed interactive installation performance that unrelentingly demands the audience's attention. Viewer discretion is strongly advised due to imagery of graphic violence. "Revelence" will be performed Thursday, Feb. 27 through Saturday, March 1 at 8 p.m. at the Mainstage, Emily Dickinson Hall, Hampshire College. Admission is $3 for student and $5 for the general public. Please call (413) 559-5351 to make reservations. Tickets can be picked up the night of the performance.

AMHERST – "Some Asians," a play by Alice Tuan, will be performed at The Curtain Theater, Fine Arts Center at UMass from Thursday, Feb. 27 through March 1 at 8 p.m. A free talk-back with the artists will follow the Feb. 28 performance. "Some Asians" takes a unique look at Asian history. Tuan's play represents the various players in Asian history, Britain and Hong Kong as represented by characters. This personification allows for a unique perspective of putting "history into a personal context," as MFA directing student Sheila Siragusa described it. The play does contain sexually explicit content. Tickets are $10 for the general public and $5 for students and seniors. Call (413) 545-2511 for more information.

DANCE

SOUTH HADLEY – The Five College Dance Department presents their Faculty Dance Concert, a night that promises to be nothing short of provocative. The program consists of the seminal modern work "Suspension" by May O' Donnell, the 2002 recipient of the Martha Hill Lifetime Achievement Award, as well as other performances. Among these performances will also be choreographic work by Jim Coleman and Terese Freedman of Mt. Holyoke, associate professor Billbob Brown of UMass, and guest artists Mark Davis of Smith College, Amie Dowling and Julie Lichtenberg of Amherst College and Fritha Pengelly of Hampshire. The program runs from Thursday, Feb. 27 through March 1, at 8 p.m. at the Studio Theater, Kendall Hall, on the Mt. Holyoke campus. Tickets are $10 for the general public and $5 for students and seniors. For reservations, call (413) 538-2848 or e-mail dance-reservations@mtholyoke.edu.

Mother Nature's wrath nothing new for UMass

By JIM PIGNATIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The rain poured on Garber Field Saturday afternoon. The fans carried umbrellas, bundled up in winter coats and fought the 40-degree weather to cheer on the No. 8 UMass men's lacrosse team.

It was dank, cold and dreary.

But for the Maroon and White, it probably felt closer to the tropics than the arctic.

The Minutemen, whose fans donned scarves, wool hats, umbrellas and gloves, wore shorts.

"Today was a nice day," said UMass coach Greg Canella, whose team has been practicing outside in the snow for a month.

"To us, as long as it's not snow, we're psyched."

"Compared to the last two weeks, it [was] beautiful out there," said senior midfielder Chris Fiore, who scored five goals in UMass' 13-7 win over Sacred Heart Saturday.

While the rain did pose some problems for the Minutemen early – as their speed game was slowed down and they fell behind 2-0 – they clearly adjusted better to the weather.

UMass came roaring back and outscored SHU 5-1 to finish the first quarter on top by two goals. The Minutemen never looked back, steadily increasing their lead up to the final six-goal deficit.

As the leader of one of the top programs in the east, Canella knows that UMass will have to deal with tough weather conditions from time to time and doesn't hold back when leading practice.

"We practice in it and tell our guys, 'some day, you are going to have to play in this weather and you'll have to be good in it, if we want to win the game,'" Canella said.

"I don't think our group is afraid to play in any conditions."

Fiore admitted that the tough practices likely gave his team an advantage down the stretch.

"I think it helped us out," Fiore said. "We've been expecting cold, cold, cold, and today was actually a warm day. Luckily it was rain and not snow."

Not every team has the determination to play through bad weather, as two major men's lacrosse games were cancelled this weekend because of the same heavy rain the Minutemen were appreciating.

"They cancelled the Georgetown, Maryland game because it was raining and the Hofstra, Villanova game because it was raining," Canella said.

"Raining?"

Indeed. No. 5 Maryland postponed its game with No. 6 Georgetown because of the rain, while No. 10 Hofstra also cancelled its home game against Villanova.

The Maryland game will be rescheduled in April, while no date has been set to make up the Hofstra cancellation.

Sophomore Jeff Zywicki and the Minutemen rolled past Sacred Heart 13-7 on Saturday at rainy Garber Field.

Fiore's five goals lead Minutemen to rain-soaked victory over SH all-FCAC selection posted five tallies on the day, a career-high, and added an assist. Junior Jeff Zywicki added a hat trick of his own and preseason All-American Kevin Leveille scored a pair of his own.

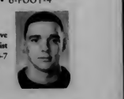
"We talked about it before," Canella said. "We count on our seniors every year. Certainly Chris had a big game today to get five goals. You can expect people to really go after him, and they did, there was a pole on him all day long, but he picked and chose his opportunities and fortunately his shots went in."

Schell certainly improved as the game went on, shaking off the cold and the rain to come through with six saves on the afternoon, including a crucial stick save on a SHU quick stick with less than six seconds to go in the half.

"They were making a run at us and he made one or two big saves for us," Canella said. "That's what your goalie's supposed to do. Fortunately, Billy's got a year under his belt, and you hope that he can continue to build confidence in himself and his own ability. The goalie position is tough. You're the last stop, and when the ball goes in, you feel it's your fault."



The Minutemen struggled in the faceoff circle early, and it looked as though the loss of sophomore Craig Conn due to academics would hurt the Minutemen. But Zywicki and freshman Dane Collins, like the rest of the Minutemen, got stronger as the game went on, to win 15 of 25 faceoffs on the game.

"It's great to see Dane have some success," said Canella, who is in his ninth year at the helm of the Minutemen. "Anytime a freshman can get in there in the first game of the year and have the success that he did, especially early in the game – we're down 2-0, he's out there on the faceoff and wins it. He knows, and we know that he's going to need to continue to work hard on it."

The Pioneers were expected to bring a physical style with them to Amherst, and the game lived up to expectations in that manner. The highlight physically came on a wild exchange in the third quarter. Senior Tom Fallon annihilated a Pioneer midfielder as he crossed into the offensive zone, and Chris Doyle collected the ball. Doyle was then laid out by redshirt freshman Matt Robideau, losing his helmet in a violent collision.

"We practice every day in a pretty physical style," Canella said. "Guys on our team can't intimidate other guys on our team and when we go into a game the other team can't intimidate us. It was great to see Chris Doyle bounce up on that hit. That was as big a hit as you'll see in lacrosse, his helmet came off, he looked for his helmet, popped it back on, and went back in the game."

Living up to the hype

Jim Pignatiello

Anthony Anderson was in a funk.

He wasn't knocking down shots and the UMass offense was struggling. Anderson wasn't necessarily hurting the team, but he wasn't playing up to his talent and the Minutemen started out 1-6 on the season.

Finally, Anderson dropped 22 points on Dec. 14 against Florida International for the Maroon and White in its first win over a Division I opponent.

The old adage of "now Anthony goes, so go the Minutemen," began to form. Heading into Atlantic 10 play, UMass was 5-6. Anderson reached double digits in four of UMass' wins – including a career-high 25 points against then-No. 24 North Carolina State.

He reached the mark just once in a loss, with a 13-point performance in the Dec. 10 heartbreaker to Connecticut.

The trend continued for the Minutemen, who lost their first four A-10 games as Anderson failed to score 10 in any of the contests and coach Steve Lappas, who had answered questions about No. 12's inconsistency, with a lack of urgency, admitted "I am getting worried about him."

But something happened at La Salle on Jan. 22. While the team struggled and lost by 18, Anderson scored 13. At George Washington later that week, Anderson scored 10 in UMass' first A-10 win.

The run continued yesterday at the Mullins Center, where Anderson scored in double-digits for the ninth time in his last 10 games. UMass has won five games in that stretch.

The Lynn, Mass. native didn't just "reach" double-digits Sunday, though. He dominated Duquesne in UMass' 70-55 win and scored 25 points, matching his career-high. No. 12 was a perfect 9-for-9 from the field in the second half, including 4-for-4 from behind the 3-point line.

"[The hoop was] as big as it could be," Anderson said of his 22-point second half. "Everything was going in for me."

Along with his 3-point shots falling with more regularity, Anderson has taken the ball to the hoop more, resulting in more assists, but also more nifty layups, like the off-balance floater he beat Duquesne center Ron Dukes with Sunday.

"[I've been] looking to drive more," said Anderson, who also led the team with eight assists. "[I do it] more driving to kick it out, than to shoot it. But when it's there, I have to take it."

His kickouts led to 3-pointers from freshman Jeff Viggiano (4-for-7) and sophomore Brennan Martin (1-for-4), while he finished the night at 5-for-7 on 3-pointers.

"When you shoot the ball well from the outside," UMass coach Steve Lappas said, "that's when our motion offense (works)."

Lappas squad struggled early, scoring just five points in the first 10 minutes, 23 seconds of play and then erupted for 65 points in the game's final 29:37.

Anderson, in particular, was unrelenting against Duquesne, knocking down shot after shot until the Dukes' collective will was clearly broken.

UMass held a 36-32 lead with 16:32 remaining, when Anderson virtually ended the game. The Minutemen outscored the Dukes 13-4 over the next six minutes, with Anderson posting 12 points on the run.

UMass never looked back, as Anderson scored 10 more points down the stretch to match the team's season-high three-game winning streak.

Anderson may have caught a good deal of blame earlier in the season, but now he deserves credit for becoming the leader of the Minutemen.

In fact, he is so much of a leader that No. 12 averages 37 minutes in A-10 games.

"I play a lot of minutes every night," said Anderson, who walked the ball up the court rather slowly a few times in the second half. "I have to pick and choose where I could (slow down). Walking the ball up the court helps."

With Anderson playing up to his preseason All-Conference Third Team selection, UMass is looking to make a run at fourth place in the East Division, which would mean a home playoff game in the first round of the A-10 Tournament.

Not bad, since he'll don the No. 12 for Coach Lappas for two more years.

Jim Pignatiello is a Collegian Columnist.

t picked it up in the second half."

Viggiano had nine second-half points, all on threes. But once the Minutemen took the lead, it was Anderson's turn to take over.

The sophomore point guard had 10 points and two assists during a 22-6 run that gave UMass a 47-34 lead with 13 minutes left.

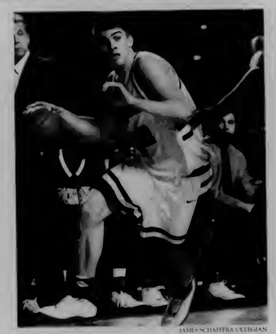
He followed that with 12 points and three assists on the Minutemen's game ending run.

Overall, the Anderson, Viggiano and Rogers triumvirate combined for 57 of the team's 70 points.

"When you play motion," Lappas said, "the right guys have always gotten the shots. Motion gears to the better shooters."

UMass tied a season high with 10 3-pointers, nine of which came from the outside duo of Anderson and Viggiano.

"Anthony Anderson is doing this now and then Viggiano starts doing it," Lappas said. "Then you really have a potent perimeter. Then you can't leave us alone.



"We have to be dangerous."

One of UMass' season-long crutches almost hurt it in the end. The Dukes won the battle on the glass in the first half, 20-10. But a few motivational words from Lappas spurred the Minutemen to a recovery in the second.

"We just knew we had to come out there and rebound to win the game," Rogers said. "Lapp was like 'c'mon, we have to pick it up."

They did, out rebounding Duquesne by six in the second half.

The Minutemen also did an admirable job of disrupting the Dukes two outside threats of Kevin Forney and Jimmy Tricco with a triangle and two defenses. Forney had 14 points but was only 1-for-4 from 3, while Tricco made only one of three shots.

Jeff Viggiano delighted supporters from his hometown on "Suffield Day" at the Mullins Center with 14 points as UMass downed Duquesne 70-55.

Whiteout turned whitewash

Shutout follows stunning victory over Black Bears

By ANDY VOGT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Having played just one game over a two-week span prior to the weekend series with No. 3 Maine, the Massachusetts hockey team had every reason to be energized for Friday night.

The Minutemen did not disappoint the 5,084 whiteclad fans in attendance at the Mullins Center, arguably putting forth its most impressive game of the season in the form of a 4-2 victory over the Black Bears. Although UMass dropped the back end of the weekend series the next night, Friday's win broke the Minutemen (16-16-1, 9-14-0 Hockey East) out of a sluggish February in which their lone victory came last week against Connecticut.

"UMass played a great game and definitely deserved to win," Maine coach Tim Whitehead said on Friday night. "I thought in general they carried the play hard."

Stephen Werner iced the game with two critical goals, including a breakaway tally with 39 seconds left in the second period to give UMass some breathing room in its first conference win in nearly a month. Mike Warner fed a streaking Werner at center ice who broke in, deked left and slid the puck past fallen Maine goaltender Jimmy Howard.

"I played with Jimmy Howard last year [on the U.S. Under-18 team] and deke was always the way to go," Warner said of the goal that proved to be the game-winner. "He's pretty square most of the time."

Werner added another midway through the third, as he backhanded a nifty shot under the crossbar to give UMass a 4-1 lead. For the freshman, the two tallies ended a six game scoring drought dating back to Jan. 24.

"It definitely felt good. I've been struggling in that department," Werner said.

UMass carried the play from the start on Friday, and was clearly the more physical of the two teams throughout the entire game. The line of Peter Alden, Tim Vitek and Stephen Jacobs proved had a bruising effect on the Black Bears, who had only won two of their previous seven Chris Capraro and the Mass Attack defeated No. 3 Maine 4-2 on Friday night, but were unable to complete the weekend sweep, falling to the Black Bears 4-0 on Saturday.

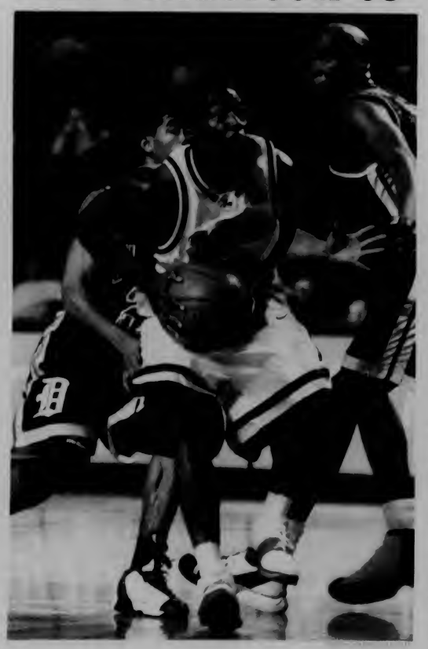
Support is on the rise

Matt Brady

This weekend was a monumental step for the UMass hockey program. In a pair of games against national powerhouse Maine, the Minutemen drew just shy of 10,000 people to the Mullins Center. Friday and Saturday represented the eighth and ninth best attendances, respectively, for home games in the program's history – and the second and third best crowds of the season.



"We knew the crowd was involved and that was a good thing," UMass coach Don Cahoon said following Friday's contest. "I'm getting to find my way around campus these days and getting to know these students that are good fans of ours. Hopefully we can get seven or eight thousand fans in here on a regular basis and get this program headed in the right direction."

The Minutemen hosted "White Out Night" on Friday, handing out T-shirts to the first 1,500 student fans that arrived. This resulted in a raucous crowd in front of a national TV audience. It also brought the crowd out early to the game, and the Minutemen warmed up in front of the most people in recent memory.

Still, Cahoon seemed concerned following Saturday's contest, in that the vulgarity of some of the student fans is not conducive to a positive atmosphere. He also encouraged fans to cheer UMass rather than heckling

Guard has career day

By MATTHEW F. SACCO

Without the services of starting shooting guard Mike Lavme and reserve swingman Raheim Lamb, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Steve Lappas was forced to face Duquesne with a depleted seven-man rotation. He could amend the problem on defense with an energy saving zone, but on the offensive end, he needed somebody to step up.

Three players answered that call, as Anthony Anderson (25 points), Jackie Rogers (18 points) and Jeff Viggiano (14 points) led the Minutemen to a 70-55 win.

"I thought it was a great team win for us," Lappas said. "We were a little undermanned but some guys really stepped up and helped us."

Lamb left the team indefinitely on Saturday, while Lavme suffered an injury to his elbow.

But every time UMass (11-14, 5-7 Atlantic 10) needed a lift, one of the game's three stars stepped in.

First it was Rogers. The senior captain did not start because he showed up late for pre-game warm-ups, giving freshman Alassane Kouyate his first career nod.

When the Dukes opened the game with an 18-7 run, Rogers came off the bench with 10 first-half points to help cut the deficit to three by halftime.

Then Jeff Viggiano hit two 3-pointers in a two-minute span to give UMass its first lead with 17 minutes, 45 seconds left. The freshman small forward was playing in front of a large assemblage of his hometown fans on Suffield, Conn. community night.

"It was great to see the support," Viggiano said. "I don't know what I was doing [in the first half], I was just kind of out there running around. But

Slingin' in the rain

On a field surrounded by snow and drenched by rain, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team kicked off its quest for the 2003 National Championship on Saturday.

The Minutemen (1-0, 0-0 East Coast Athletic Conference), despite falling behind 2-0 early to a Sacred Heart squad that was relying on a freshman goaltender and a trio of rookie defensemen, took over from the second quarter on to cruise to a 13-7 victory.

"I'm pleased with the way they prepared themselves to play and the way that they stayed composed when we went down 2-0," UMass coach Greg Canella said. "You don't know how some guys are going to react to that, but our seniors stepped up and took over, with some really positive leadership."

"It's great to get off on a win," senior midfielder Chris Fiore said. "We came out a little flat in our scrimmage with Dartmouth, but coming out now with a win here, it builds everyone's confidence and the young guys got a little taste of everything so it helps us out a lot."

Stephen Grabow and James Delmonico scored a pair of goals in the first 2:48 of the game for the Pioneers (0-1, 0-0 Colonial). Meanwhile, at the other end, freshman netminder Thomas Hind started strong out of the gates to energize the visitors.

"They got some good looks. They're a pretty good team – offensively that was a good team that we faced. Again, it's hard, it's pouring rain, first game of the year, his hands are probably cold," Canella said of sophomore goaltender Bill Schell. "He settled down, the defense really allowed us to settle down as a team."

"When we first came out we started shooting high a lot because it's the natural thing to do, but the goalie was good high so we started shooting low and they started falling," Fiore said.

For Fiore, the goals came often as the preseason

Second annual Greek leadership conference held in Campus Center

By KRISTIN SHREWSBURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Greek community came together with the support of the Student Government Association (SGA) Saturday for the annual University of Massachusetts Greek Leadership Conference.

The conference featured workshops and a discussion by Keynote Speaker John Mountz of North Carolina State University. The event also featured a Stroll Exhibition, step dancing accompanied by chanting.

Fraternity and sorority members from the Greek area gathered at 9 a.m. in the Campus Center for a day of workshops focused on scholarship, recruitment, community service, alcohol awareness and campus involvement.

Issues were raised as the Greek areas discussed ways of correlating the Panhellenic Council, the Inter-Fraternal Council, National Panhellenic Council (NPHC) and the Multicultural Greek Council into one large community.

The conference also hosted UMass fraternity and sorority alumni, as well as outside speakers from various Greek organizations.

Members of the SGA also made an appearance in an effort to learn more about what the Greek area faces as a community.

"The goal was to get to know members of the Greek area and let them get to know us," President Dave Carr said. "I think it was more of a learning experience for me than it was for them. It was a great opportunity for me, and the SGA to learn more about their problems from their side."

Administrative issues have recently been raised that would pose problems for the Greek community, specifically revolving around pre-approved freshmen housing within the Greek area. A recent decision to remove pre-approved freshmen housing was mandated by the administration, thus leaving concerns and questions amongst the Greek community.

However, Carr explained a referendum question will be placed on the spring 2003 election ballot regarding whether students feel freshmen should be allowed to live in fraternity and sorority houses.

"I was figuring out all the numbers before the conference, and not allowing freshman to move into a house that holds 40 beds will not have as much as an effect as a house that holds 15 beds, and we're small, so there is a problem," Carr said. "A lot of houses won't be able to stay if this happens, and there's already been a lot of talk of this, so I'm putting a question on the battle regarding Greek housing and how I feel it is vital to this University."

In light of recent struggles, members of the Greek area attended workshops on fundraising and programming. Each workshop focused on ways of improvement not only for the Greek system, but for their appearance and involvement within the University as well.

Keynote Speaker John Mountz presented his thoughts on the UMass Greek community, explaining that it is up to them to make changes on campus.

"He (Mountz) really raised issues pertinent to our Greek area, and he didn't hide anything," Panhellenic President Kristen Laviano said. "He laid it out on the table and told us basically if we want to make changes, then we have to go out and do something about it."

Former Sigma Phi Epsilon Joshua Endler and Amy Owens discussed fundraising and emphasized scholarship programs. Endler discussed in detail ways to not only get alumni involvement within each chapter but ways to work within the University as well as a means of fundraising.

"I think it went really well, and I learned more than I expected to, especially about working through alumni's and fundraising through the University," Carl Ianacci of the Inter-Fraternal Council said. "I think it always helps to show the University that we do other things than just drink beer, and this show's the leadership roles that we take on – not to mention that we had members of the Administration here speaking to us and getting to know us, which always helps."

Laviano agreed, explaining that relations need to get stronger between the Greeks and the Administration and noting how meeting together as an entirety is the start.

"It was great to see that every chapter had Greek representation there and that everyone was able to get together," Laviano said.

Laviano and Ianacci are scheduled to meet with Chancellor John V. Lombardi today in an effort to continue to work out issues between the Administration and Greek area.

"We have never had a strong connection with the administration, so Carl and I are meeting to hopefully start forming a stronger relationship with the administration," Laviano said. "We don't get a lot of P.R., and when we do, it's mainly negative, so we're hoping this will be the start of us working together."

Powell meets with Chinese officials

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell looks on, as Chinese President Jiang Zemin gestures toward members of Powell's delegation before a meeting on Monday, Feb. 24. Powell met with Chinese officials Monday and said China is eager to play a positive role in resolving the developing crisis over North Koreas nuclear weapons programs.

By GEORGE GEDDA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) – Chinese officials rebuffed a U.S. proposal Monday for a regional coalition to pressure North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program and told Secretary of State Colin Powell that direct talks between the United States and North Korea hold the best hope for resolving the dispute.

After his talks in Beijing, Powell flew to South Korea for today's inauguration of President-elect Roh Moo-hyun, also an advocate of U.S. negotiations with North Korea. Roh, who favors reconciliation with Pyongyang, also says he would not support any U.S. plan to attack North Korea.

Today Powell is expected to announce a major donation of U.S. food to the North Korean people, many of whom are believed to suffer severe famine-induced malnutrition.

North Korea and Iraq dominated separate meetings Powell held with Chinese Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan, Vice President Hu Jintao and President Jiang Zemin.

The discussions on Iraq were inconclusive. China favors continued U.N. inspections in Iraq as opposed to a second U.N. Security Council resolution that would authorize military action should Iraq refuse to disarm. The United States and Britain are to propose the resolution on Tuesday.

Left unclear from Powell's talks in Beijing was whether China would veto a second resolution if it should come to a council vote.

On North Korea, Powell has pushed for a multilateral effort to dismantle Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program for weeks, with scant results.

At a news conference Monday, the American said the North Korean weapons issue "is a matter for China, it's a matter for South Korea, it's a matter for Japan, it's a matter for Russia, and it's a matter for the United Nations."

He added that the United States feels strongly that "North Korea's actions pose a threat to regional stability and to the global nonproliferation regime."

Chinese state television quoted Tang, the foreign minister, as saying that China hopes for talks on the nuclear issue between the United States and North Korea "on an equal basis."

The Chinese state news agency Xinhua, meanwhile, reported that Vice President Hu made the same point and said U.S. talks with North Korea should begin soon.

North Korea itself has long advocated direct discussions with Washington that would lead to a nonaggression treaty.

Powell has said direct talks in 1994 resulted in a promise by Pyongyang to forgo nuclear weapons, which he said the communist government has since violated. Only much broader international participation has a chance of producing a satisfactory outcome he has said.

U.S. government analysts fear that North Korea, left unchecked, could have six plutonium-based nuclear weapons in a few months, possibly leading to a destabilizing regional arms race. Among countries in the area, only Japan has sided with the United States in its call for international negotiations.

China says it favors a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula, but U.S. officials complain that Beijing has done little to achieve that objective.

The one bright spot for the United States on the North Korean problem was the Feb. 13 decision by the International Atomic Energy Agency to refer North Korea's nuclear ambitions to the United Nations.

The action fit nicely with the U.S. view that Pyongyang's actions are a global concern. Administration officials said last week, however, that it is doubtful the Security Council will take a strong stand because of opposition from Russia.

In Beijing, Powell said China is eager to play a positive role in helping to quiet misgivings about Pyongyang's weapons programs. China is undertaking initiatives with North Korea, Powell said, that he was unable to discuss publicly.

Powell has said that China is uniquely positioned to influence North Korea because it is by far Pyongyang's largest aid donor.

Theft and arrests keep police busy

University of Massachusetts Police responded to a theft from the Morrill Science Center Friday of laboratory equipment valued at more than $3000.

The larceny involved the theft of two balances used in laboratory work. Combined, they are valued at between $3,000 and $5,500. Anyone with information on the possible theft can call UMPD at 545-0893 or use the anonymous TIPS hotline at 577-8477.

Four arrests were also made over the weekend.

A UMPD officer was dispatched after the report of an assault in the North Village Apartments on N. Pleasant St. was made at 4:03 p.m. Friday. John Y. Konadu, 32, of unit B-5 in the complex was arrested and charged with assault and battery.

Another arrest was made at 10:17 p.m. Friday night after UMass police stopped a man for being intoxicated. The man, Aaron Vlahos, 20, of 6 Drexel Terrace in Lynn, Mass., was arrested and charged with having possession of a class C substance.

Several hours later on Saturday morning, a traffic stop at 2:06 a.m. led to the arrest of another man, Michael P. Genereus, 22, of 171 Fayette St. in Watertown, Mass., was arrested and charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and for other miscellaneous violations.

UMPD reported the last arrest was made at 7:57 p.m. Saturday night after the police responded to a report of a suspicious person in Cance Hall in the Southwest residential living area of campus. Aaron Vlahos, 21, of 33 Shelas Way in Lynn, Mass., was arrested and charged with trespassing.

Several other unusual calls were made to UMass over the course of the weekend. At two different times early Sunday morning, reports of fire extinguishers being thrown out of windows at John Quincy Adams Tower were made.

At 1:20 a.m. an officer reported that multiple extinguishers were thrown out of a window. Twenty-eight minutes later, student security made a similar call, reporting that a fire extinguisher was thrown out of the 12th floor window of JQA. No one was found in connection with either incident.

No additional information was released yesterday to the Collegian on the previously reported armed robbery in Cashin Hall Thursday night. UMPD could not be reached for comment.

Hussein wants debate

By NIKO PRICE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – In an interview with CBS anchor Dan Rather, Saddam Hussein challenged President Bush on Monday to an internationally televised debate and indicated he did not intend to follow U.N. orders to destroy his Al-Samoud 2 missiles.

Saddam said he envisioned a live debate with Bush along the lines of those in a U.S. presidential campaign, CBS said on its Web site.

Rather was to report on the comments on the Monday evening newscast, and CBS planned to broadcast the interview in its entirety Wednesday.

Regarding chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix's order that Iraq destroy its Al-Samoud 2 missiles, "Saddam indicated he does not intend to destroy them or pledge to destroy them as demanded," the network said.

The order was issued after international experts determined the missile flew farther than the 93-mile limit set down by the United Nations in 1991. Iraq maintains some of the missiles overshot the limit because they were tested without warheads and guidance systems.

"This is not a serious issue," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said of the reported debate offer. "There is no debating his need to disarm."

Fleischer said Saddam's comments about the Al Samouds represented "open defiance" of the United Nations.

"He refuses even to acknowledge that the weapons are prohibited," Fleischer said.

Iraq has until the end of the week to begin destroying the missiles, components and other related systems. If it fails to do so, that could give impetus to a draft U.N. resolution submitted Monday by the United States, Britain and Spain that would pave the way for war.

Iraq had suggested it was trying to persuade the United Nations to allow it to keep the missiles after technical modifications worked out in talks with U.N. technicians.

In New York, Blix said he was sending his chief deputy Demetrius Perricos to Baghdad to discuss the demand with Iraqi officials but that his order still stands.

"Well, we have set the date for the commencement of the destruction of these missiles and we expect that to be respected," Blix said. "There will be a discussion about the pace of the destruction and Mr. Perricos as my deputy, will be there for that purpose."

On Sunday, the reclusive Iraqi president met separately with Russian envoys Yevgeny Primakov, a former Soviet foreign minister and Russian prime minister, and Ramsey Clark, a former U.S. attorney general prominent in the global anti-war movement.

Saddam told Primakov he would cooperate completely with U.N. inspectors tasked with verifying that Iraq has rid itself of weapons of mass destruction, Russia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

"Saddam Hussein said that there will be no hindrances to the work of inspectors," the ministry said.

Clark came away with a similar impression, telling The Associated Press: "He's thinking he'll do anything that he reasonably can that is honorable and protective of the sovereignty of his peo-

SATURDAY, FEB. 15

12:19 a.m. The Amherst Police Department (APD) called the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) to request assistance in meeting an officer who found a college aged male slumped over in a snow bank at 510 N. Pleasant St. The subject was assisted by friends.

12:59 a.m. A disturbance was reported in Lot 15 on Anthony Way. APD reported that there was a fight involving two people.

12:57 a.m. A caller reported that there were people drifting in Lot 48 on Chancellors Drive. An officer reported that the caller was with a group that had already been a problem earlier in the evening. One person was trespassed.

6:13 p.m. A domestic disturbance was reported at Patterson Hall on Sunset Avenue. An officer responded to a disturbance and 911 call leading to the arrest of Jason A. Williams, 18, of 21 Worcester Square in Boston, Mass. Williams was charged with assault and battery.

7:52 p.m. An officer responded to liquor law violations in the Southwest Mall. Linh V. Chau, 19, was arrested and charged with possession of liquor while being under the age of 21 and use of a false liquor ID card.

SUNDAY, FEB. 16

12:03 p.m. A medical emergency was reported in Van Meter Hall on Clark Hill Road. The Amherst Fire Department (AFD) was dispatched and transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

1:05 p.m. A caller reported that someone in Washington Tower on Fearing Street ripped a sink off of a wall in the wall as the cold water shut off valve. Hampton Service was notified. Raymond A. Larkin, 21 of 271 W. St. in Seekonk, Mass., was arrested and charged with wanton destruction of property valued at more than $250.

2:13 a.m. A caller reported that her L.L. Bean navy blue bicycle was stolen from in front of her dorm, Crampton Hall.

3:47 a.m. A medical emergency was reported in Gorman Hall on Butterfield Terrace. AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

4:02 p.m. A caller reported that he ordered a book through the mail that was delivered on Feb. 5 by the United Postal Service. He said that an unknown person signed for it at the dorm and stole it.

7:37 p.m.: A caller in John Adams Tower reported someone knocking on his door asking questions on two separate occasions. He was advised to keep his door shut and locked for his own safety.

MONDAY, FEB. 17

4:04 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in Grayson Hall on Orchard Hill Drive. A person was injured when a window broke. The patient signed a refusal of treatment by AFD and Emergency Housing was notified.

6:05 p.m. A vehicle fire was reported in Lot 45 on Holdsworth Way near the PVTA bus facility. AFD responded and put the fire out. The vehicle was towed.

9:11 p.m. A caller in Baker Hall on Clark Hill Road reported that a male watched her last Wednesday while she was in the shower.

TUESDAY, FEB. 18

12:29 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in Mackimmie Hall on Sunset Avenue. AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

1:53 a.m.: A medical emergency was reported in John Quincy Adams Tower. AFD transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

8:55 a.m.: The custodial supervisor at University Press on E. Pleasant Street reported that one of his maintainers called him reporting damage to vehicles with paintballs by the Nelson Houses.

10:46 a.m.: Pornography was reported at Curry Hicks Cage on Hicks Way. The material was collected, investigated and discarded.

5:36 p.m.: A caller reported that a vehicle in Lot 13 was struck with paintballs some time the previous night.

6:44 p.m.: Vandalism was reported in Lot 50 on John Adams Road. The driver side mirror was smashed on an automobile.

7:55 p.m.: A caller reported that a jacket, keys and Tiffany key ring were taken from the area.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 19

6:23 a.m.: Vandalism was reported in Lot 44 on Sylvan Drive. An officer on the scene reported that the rear driver's side window was broken out of a vehicle, but that it did not appear that anything was missing. The owner was contacted and is en route.

10:55 a.m.: A caller reported that someone during the night "torched" two doors and a sign number.

4:26 p.m.: A caller reported that the back window of his car in Lot 44 on Sylvan Drive was smashed out sometime after midnight.

7:24 p.m.: A disturbance was reported at Coolidge Tower on Massachusetts Avenue. Kendy I. Amazan, 24, of 124 Meadow St. in Amherst was arrested.

THURSDAY, FEB. 20

1:51 p.m.: A suspicious vehicle was reported in the Southwest Mall. The vehicle was parked running and unattended by Washington Tower. The sergeant secured and confiscated the keys from the vehicle.

2:52 p.m. A bale of hay was reported out on the ice of Cranberry Pond in Montague. Responding officers reported that all was clear.

3:29 p.m.: Periodicals were reported damaged at the W.E.B. DuBois Library.

5:18 p.m.: A medical emergency was reported in John Adams Tower on Fearing Street. An ambulance transported one person to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

8:24 p.m.: A caller in Cashin Hall on Eastman Lane reported a robbery. UMPD spokesperson Jim Lyons said that two suspects reportedly fled the scene, and that after an area search, police forces arrested one student, Young W. Lee, 20, of 9 Muller St. in Tenafly, N.J., was arrested and charged with armed robbery, breaking and entering in the nighttime and being accessory to a crime before the fact.

FRIDAY, FEB. 21

1:41 a.m.: A disturbance was reported in Washington Tower on Fearing Street. Student security called in a disturbance on the seventh floor hallway between two parties. An officer on the scene reported that he had both parties and that it was a verbal altercation.

9:35 a.m.: A caller reported two balances (scales) missing from the Morrill Science Center. The items are valued at approximately $5,000 to $5,500.

11:13 a.m.: Amherst Towing called to request assistance with an unhappy customer in Lot 12 on Forestry Way.

4:03 p.m.: Police responded to a report of an assault in the North Village Apartments on N. Pleasant Street. John Y. Konadu, 32, of 1004 N. Pleasant St., Unit B-5 was arrested and charged with assault and battery.

8:05 p.m.: Police responded to liquor law violations in Lot 54 near Southwest Circle. The subject will be summoned to court for possession of liquor while being under the age of 21.

9:26 p.m.: An RA in Van Meter Hall on Clark Hill Road reported a "round robin" party on the second, third, fourth and fifth floors of the building. An officer responded and reported that the party was dispersed upon arrival and that the matter has been referred to Housing Services.

10:17 p.m.: An intoxicated person at James Hall on Massachusetts Avenue was stopped by UMPD. The individual, Aaron Vlahos, 20, of 6 Drexel Terrace in Lynn, Mass., was charged with possession of a class C substance.

ple to prevent war."

But Clark, who said Saddam appeared "remarkably relaxed," also said the Iraqi president is convinced nothing he can do will prevent a U.S.-British attack because President Bush has already made up his mind.

"What he thinks is, no matter what Iraq's performance is, the president will attack," Clark said.

Earlier Monday, Fleischer said the destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles would not satisfy Bush. He said stockpiles of sarin and VX nerve agent were still missing.

"This is not about public relations. This is about protecting the lives of the American people," Fleischer said. "If Saddam Hussein destroys the missiles that he said he never had ... you've got to wonder what other weapons does he have?"

Iraq declared the existence of the Al Samoud 2s as a short range missile in its 12,000-page report to the United Nations in December.

A top adviser to Saddam, Lt. Gen. Amer al-Saadi, said Monday that Iraq was still drafting its response to the order that Iraq begin destroying the missiles by Saturday.

"There is an open dialogue between us and (the weapons inspectors) and we hope that it will be settled," he said.

Those comments implied that Iraq was holding out hope that the missiles could be modified to allow them to remain in Baghdad's arsenal, possibly for use against invading U.S.-led forces.

The 93-mile limit – imposed after U.S.-led forces drove the Iraqi army from Kuwait – means Iraq is permitted to have missiles that could reach neighboring Iran, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Syria and Jordan – but not Israel.

Earlier this month, Saddam gave his first Western television interview in more than a decade, speaking with a retired British lawmaker and peace activist, Tony Benn.

Saddam gave several interviews during the Gulf War in early 1991.

In one famous encounter, he spoke in a bungalow in Baghdad with Peter Arnett, CNN's correspondent in Iraq. Arnett quoted Saddam as saying he could not predict how long the war would last but promised "lots of blood will be shed on every side" and said he was confident Iraq would prevail. Iraq was routed in that war, which started after it invaded neighboring Kuwait.

New resolution presented to United Nations

By Edith M. Lederer
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS (AP) – Seeking U.N. approval for military action against Iraq, the United States, Britain and Spain submitted a resolution to the Security Council Monday declaring that Saddam Hussein has missed "the final opportunity" to disarm peacefully.

But France, Russia and Germany, which oppose the war option, circulated an alternative plan to pursue a peaceful disarmament of Iraq over at least the next five months. China said it also supports that proposal.

The rival positions set the stage for a heated battle over whether the council would back the U.S. and British demand for war now or the French, Russian, and German call for war to be "a last resort."

Getting approval for the U.S.-backed resolution will be a daunting task. To pass, the resolution must have nine "yes" votes and avoid a veto by France, Russia or China. Eleven of the 15 council members want to see U.N. weapons inspections continue; Bulgaria is likely to support the U.S.-British-Spanish plan.

Secretary of State Colin Powell urged China to support the new resolution at meetings with top officials in Beijing on Monday, but the Chinese stood by their long-standing position that U.N. inspections should continue.

The United States has dispatched some of its top negotiators to Security Council capitals in recent days to lobby for the resolution. A new resolution is important for many key allies that face staunch popular opposition to war.

Washington has reserved the right to wage war unilaterally, but U.N. backing would provide legitimacy and financial support for military action and its aftermath. On Monday, Turkey's Cabinet agreed to host tens of thousands of U.S. combat troops, a key step toward allowing Washington to forge ahead with plans for a northern front against Iraq.

The draft resolution does not set any deadlines. But U.S. and British officials made clear they want the Security Council to vote by mid-March.

The resolution declares that Iraq has failed to take advantage of its last chance to disarm peacefully and therefore must face the "serious consequences" the U.N. Security Council threatened in Resolution 1441, which was adopted unanimously on Nov. 8.

The new resolution recalls that "Iraq has been and remains in material breach of its obligations" under U.N. resolutions.

It also recalls that council decided on Nov. 8 "that false statements or omissions" in its 12,000-page declaration to U.N. weapons inspectors "and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and cooperate fully in the implementation of that resolution, would constitute a further material breach."

The resolution notes that the council has repeatedly warned Iraq "that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations." It also observes that Iraq's Dec. 7 weapons declaration contained "false statements and omissions."

The resolution acts under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, making it militarily enforceable. It does not call for "all necessary means" to be used against Iraq.

Instead, its only enforcement paragraph would have the Security Council decide "that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunities afforded to it in Resolution 1441." French diplomats said the French-German-Russian plan, which includes strengthened U.N. weapons inspections, can be implemented under existing U.N. resolutions and would be submitted as a memorandum.

"The aim is to establish a timetable for Iraq's disarmament, program by program, relating to weapons of mass destruction," French President Jacques Chirac told reporters in Berlin.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Oil companies need to take more precautions in preventing hazards

Suitably overshadowed by the nightclub fire in Rhode Island over the weekend, another large fire in the Northeast affected people on a different level.

Staten Island, one of New York City's five boroughs, was struck by a large explosion and ensuing fire at a Mobil fuel-storage facility.

A faulty pump that is used to extract fuel from storage apparently caused the fire. It burned in a contained area for almost 40 hours and did not subside until 5 a.m. yesterday.

The blaze killed three workers. The fumes and smoke forced many local businesses to shut down and people to stay in their house.

According to the Fire Department, it could have been much worse had some of the large pieces of equipment careened into another one of the nearby pipes. That could have started a chain reaction of explosions that firemen may not have been able to control. Then it may have spread through houses, stores, office buildings, playgrounds, schools. It could have burnt through any of a number of accessible locations on the South Shore of Staten Island.

Since it was lucky this time. Lucky that the air quality still right for a very long time. Lucky that people were afraid to leave their houses or go to work. Lucky that only two people died. Lucky that one became a father just 12 hours before he perished.

This is just another example of oil companies being irresponsible with the transportation of their product. How can Exxon/Mobil justify the death of two workers and the severe burning of another with causing pollution?

Although nothing is going to work right all the time, but machinery that deals with dangerous substances such as fuel needs to be checked, rechecked and maintained.

A worker said he heard a loud bang before the explosion. Why weren't swift emergency measures available to be taken? Why wasn't the building structurally equipped to prevent or contain such an explosion?

It's not like there isn't a precedent for fuel related accidents. We can refer back to the Exxon Valdez incident in Alaska that killed thousands of animals in the area and polluted the water.

But they were just animals, not people. So apparently oil companies paid no mind, because accidents are still occurring.

This time people were affected. People died, and the talk on Staten Island was that more residents were in danger. The threat has since decreased, but residents in the area of the fire are wondering whether their neighborhood will ever be the same.

How will these strange gasses affect the water people drink and the air people breathe? Nobody has answers right now. It could be dangerous for children to go outside and sip from a water fountain, but nobody knows.

This is a huge concern. And it could have been avoided if the necessary precautions were taken. If these companies had learned their lesson the first time. But they didn't and people died. And now an entire borough has to face the possible aftermath.

Nightclub disasters: time to take notice

Dan Lamothe

When I first heard about the fire and melee at Rhode Island's nightspot the Station Concert Club last week, I flashbacked to all of the shows I have seen in the past year or so, and I wondered if I would have made it out in time.

Earlier this month, I made a trek for The Collegian to Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club to watch South African hard rock band Seether trot out its stuff. My initial impression of the place was that it was overcrowded. I knew the show was sold out, but it seemed like many more people had sneaked in besides. The place was buzzing with wall-to-wall people from the stage all the way out into the hallway where the beer was sold.

Crowds are nothing new for any club worth its salt. People who frequent rock shows like the Great White show last week at the Station expect to get a little roughed up. It goes with the business. They expect it to be packed. As a rule, the shows suck if it's not. It's just not as much fun; the vibe isn't there. People who go to shows in small places like the Station are either big enough to tango with the meatheads thrashing around on the middle of the floor, or they're smart enough to know how to stay the hell out of the way.

But what happens when something wacky happens? What happens when a washed-up 80s hair metal band decides to light fireworks to add some pizzazz to their set, even though they're no longer a big enough draw to do it in a place that's large enough (and safe enough) to handle the flash? Or what happens when a fight breaks out, and security guards overreact and spray a crowd with mace, inciting a riot like they did in Chicago last Monday? Then what?

When going to a nightclub, my own safety is far from the first thing I'm going to think of, It's supposed to be a given. You pay your money. You find a spot on the floor. Perhaps you grab a couple of beers, and most importantly, you have a good time. That's supposed to be the end of the story. Worse case scenario at a show is supposed to be a few bruises and maybe some squashed feet – not burns over 70 percent of the body.

"Worse case scenario at a show is supposed to be a few bruises and maybe some squashed feet – not burns over 70 percent of my body."

However, nightclub safety is an issue, and the two tragedies that occurred last week should serve as a wakeup call for nightspot owners nationwide.

Many nightclub spots are housed in old converted buildings like the Hippodrome in Springfield and the Palladium in Worcester. This isn't a bad thing; the places are chock full of excitement and originality, and that stems in part from their interesting environments. But some accountability before any problems occur would be a good start. Building codes need to be toughened, plain and simple. According to the Associated Press, current building codes didn't require the Station to have a sprinkler system. The building, an old, one-story structure made nearly completely of wood, went up like tinder once the flames spread to the ceiling. The owners were following the rules; no system was required. But shouldn't there have been? After something like this, the logical solution would be to toughen codes in the name of preventing another disaster. It would be better to err on the side of caution.

Local officials govern building codes, which means there is no one nationwide standard that must be adhered to. The Associated Press reported that The National Fire Protection Association recommends for public venues that have a capacity of more than 300 to install sprinkler systems, but there is no mandate anywhere. In Los Angeles, new codes require any building holding 50 people and serving alcohol to install sprinklers. Why not anywhere else?

Things like this aren't supposed to happen, but they could just about anywhere. Once the elements of stupidity have been mixed with alcohol – the blocked fire exits in a club that shouldn't have been opened in Chicago, the morons setting off fireworks in Rhode Island – disaster could happen anywhere.

Every bar, club, fraternity house and disco needs to take notice after Thursday's fire. If venues and party spots don't take a look in the mirror and make sure they are truly doing everything they can to make themselves safe, history is very likely to repeat itself. It's time to learn from another man's mistakes for once.

Senioritis and other diseases

Lindsey Elder

I, like the rest of campus, eagerly sat at my computer last Monday awaiting the announcement online that campus would be closed Tuesday. In anticipation, I met on stopped just in my mind all the work I could get ahead on thanks to an extra 24 hours off. Homework, Upon receiving a hundred instant messages from friends relaxing the good news, I proceeded to scream it down the hallway and listen to the eruption of laughter clapping and the revving of blenders. However the day I was looking forward to using in order to make the rest of the week easier instead became the day I realized I had been infected with the Senioritis. Transmitted through more commonly known as Senioritis, I also found out my chances of recovery were growing weaker by the minute.

My first realization of the disease was my inability to focus on the work at hand. A paper in which I had to write on my high school experience seemingly impossible. I would have dressed and in my room at this time not on to have had a paper assignment about this and being given a week to write it back. But, only now it's such a challenge in comparison to visiting friends in the dorming and going through pictures of the last few years and trying to dens all the stupid, but entertaining things my friends and I have done.

The disease itself can be long term.

Symptoms consist of any gender, all races and sexual preferences through a period of roughly three months. Onset place often from Spring Break until graduation. The more red individuals its effects can last up to nine months. By talking to and observing several of my fellow victims it appears the disease takes on many different forms. But the most common symptom is the inability to work up enough interest to attend class, study or even discuss the educational aspect of college in general.

The only treating I would be an inevitable sufferer I immediately included my thinking long and hard about whether I wanted to use my senioritis to take all the classes I've passed to before but couldn't get into or to give myself a break and take nothing but 100 level lecture and PE classes.

After this personal diagnosis, I consider myself infected with Larewellaphobia. It's finally starting to hit home that the people I care about so much will be going their separate ways or staying here and finishing up on their degrees. Going out to dinner or out to have fun at a moment's notice won't be as easy when my friends go home or migrate across the country in search of careers. It's even harder with some of my closest, most trusted friends and I – graduating officers with a war to face in our near futures.

For others, the symptoms are brought out more so by the ending of this stage in life than by who they're leaving behind. Graduphobia is when you're realizing it's time to trade in beer pong and sleeping till noon when you feel like it for khakis and a tie working from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. This is most often associated with the feeling that certain professors "love you," so you never have to bother going to class or that teachers don't really care. It's a "this is your last semester and your rules" mentality.

Then there is the I.D.I. I also know as "I've earned it") condition. It's kind of like the reasoning to eat an ice cream sundae after you've lost five pounds. The infected senior evaluates all the time, sweat, energy and money they've invested into the last four years and, enraged or disappointed, determines that it's now payback time.

Those with this type of the disease often suffer from the illusion they are immune to flunking a class, because they've devoted so much time in the past. Going to the bars or the movies the night before a midterm or before the paper you haven't started is due is another good indication you've got it.

That brings me to the final version of Senioritis. Get-me-the-beep-out-of-here-itis. This is the condition for those who are sick of registration, dining halls and red tape and consider themselves masters of the whole "college thing" and are ready to move on.

"You can consider yourself infected if your current rationale is '15 page paper? No problem. I've got five hours'."

You can consider yourself infected if your current rationale is "15 page paper? No problem. I've got 5 hours." Other symptoms are if your text books still have shrink wrap on them for one or more of your classes and if you can honestly say you spend more hours of the day on AIM than you do working on your education in some fashion.

For some, college was just something to get through to get a better job in the future, end of story. But if you or someone you know suffers from any of the above, keep in mind that there is hope. Cheer up in the sense that your days of lectures and finals are almost over, but don't lose sight focus in that you came to college for an education – not nightly bar crawls. Make the most of what time you have left and keep in mind what you're feeling is just a kind of a pre-withdrawal that we'll all go through in some fashion. Senioritis can be a tough but winnable battle, and for those planning on grad school, you have my prayers.

Letters to the Editor

MARIJUANA IS A PLANT

To the Editor:

I was glad to read Allison Leshefsky's editorial Feb. 19 concerning marijuana. Not only did it hit on some key points, but it also added some much needed reality to an otherwise imagined evil. Marijuana is a plant not a drug. Whether or not someone chooses to smoke the leaves from this plant or leaves from an oak tree should be of no concern to anyone, especially the government. As for Eric Rothermel's letter to the editor (Feb. 20), all I read was parroted government propaganda, misinformation and anti-wisdom –none of which was actually based on reality. Recent studies dispel the "gateway" theory as an obvious farce and as for the "terrorism link" now touted by government propaganda, this could be easily remedied by legalizing the plant.

Prohibition of any substance creates a black-market ripe for entrepreneurs, terrorists and violent gangs to exploit. Let us not forget though that the entrepreneurs (drug dealers/manufactures) during alcohol prohibition are now the very same folks who are trying to put these new "drug dealers" behind bars. The Kennedy's, for example, earned much of their wealth from bootlegging during prohibition. I find it hard to believe that Cannabis has that much of a link to terrorism when in fact the majority is now domestically grown or imported from Canada. Many of the social and economic problems Eric discuses, if examined closely, are in reality products of the laws themselves and not from the substance consumed. Drugs are not inherently good or bad. It's the relationship forms with a substance that determines whether or not one has problems. I invite Eric and any other ignorant (intentionally or not) people to stop by our office in the student union and learn what the facts are. To all the other enlightened folks out there, change will only happen if you get of your butts. We have meetings every Monday at 7 p.m. Room 322 in the student Union building.

FACULTY SENATE BOWS TO SPECIAL INTERESTS

To the Editor:

After I read the column concerning the UMass Faculty Senate's vote "to approve the University Health Council's motion to designate the campus as a 'Tobacco-Free Campus'," my first reaction was a sarcastic one in which

I thought Hitler would be proud of this seemingly august body. Come to find out, I was right; Hitler began what is perhaps the world's first anti-smoking campaign in the world, beginning in 1932, to promote a "secure and sanitary utopia." His concerted efforts over the following seven years resulted in a 50 percent increase in smoking throughout Europe.

As a general disclaimer, I have to admit I was raised on a tobacco farm, and my family's primary income resulted from the sale of this profitable crop. I am also a smoker who moved into Prince Hall, because I knew it had accommodations for smokers. That is why I chose to live there. This brings me to my first of many points of contention with the University Health Council that claims to have received "numerous complaints concerning the smoke" in these buildings by apparently unwary students. Sorry, but the responsibility of each prospective student when applying for housing is to determine what type of living conditions they are willing to endure.

Now, one of two things occurred: either UMass did not explicitly tell students what residence halls allowed smoking, or these students simply did not read it. As is usual in cases such as this, the offended students cloaked themselves in victimology, instead of taking the responsibility for their ignorance.

The Health Council then waxed redundant. Apparently unaware of decades of legislation and years of tradition, the council included in their motion the "prohibition of sale and distribution of any and all tobacco products on campus," as well as a prohibition on any tobacco advertisements in "University as well as student run (sic) publications." First of all, where can you now buy tobacco or cigarettes on campus? And secondly, when was the last time you saw an ad promoting smoking products in any magazine or newspaper on this campus? The Health Council will not only have us believe we are idiots who do not see those new dangers on campus, but we are assured they are there to help us defeat these monsters lurking in the wind tunnel that is UMass.

The Council will help us, because they will, upon passage of their motion by the University, inherit hundreds of thousands of dollars to "assist with adjustment." Indeed. Nature abhors a vacuum: therefore the hundreds of thousands of dollars that University Housing will lose each semester from smokers who will move out is balanced by the same money going into the Health Council, where it will be needed most.

Statistics are notoriously liquid in their ability to say whatever you want them to say. The Health Council cited statistics that appeared to prove that students who live in smoke-free environments have a 40 percent less chance of beginning smoking. However, in the next breath (and for us smokers that would be a labored breath, I'm sure) they posited that despite decades of anti-smoking campaigns, smoking among college students has risen dramatically in the last 10 years. Maybe it's not peer pressure after all that causes someone to start smoking—maybe it's just pressure period.

But, what I find most disturbing of all is that the Faculty Senate did not consider these facts when condoning what is obviously yet another special interest group's effort to garner more money in order to justify their tenuous existence. When was the last time you were saved from death by the Health Council? Heil, Faculty Senate!

These are Phil Jimenez's depictions of the White Queen and Jean Grey in 'New X-Men #139,' hitting shelves this April.

What Does 'X-Men' Artist Phil Jimenez Have Planned For 2003?

By Erik Taylor
Collegian Staff

The line outside Showcase Comics in Hadley extended far from the store's entrance. Many fans, aspiring artists and curious mall patrons stood waiting for their chance to meet one of the comic book industry's most sought after talents, Phil Jimenez. This extremely busy artist and writer struggled to keep up with the piles of comics to sign and art work to critique, yet managed to do it all while smiling.

"[This] is the funnest job I've had in years," Jimenez said.

He has every reason for the optimism. He has finished up his highly successful run on DC's "Wonder Woman" and now has two exciting projects on his plate. Over the course of 2003, Jimenez will take over the art chores for Marvel's "New X-Men" for two separate story arcs and then write and draw his own project for Vertigo, a 12 issue maxi-series entitled "Otherworld."

During the art for the "X-Men" is no common task. It is one of the comic industry's most successful franchises and is becoming Hollywood's newest fixation. With acclaimed writer Grant Morrison providing intriguing and innovative scripts, Jimenez couldn't be in better company.

"Grant Morrison's scripts are great to work from," Jimenez said. "He starts in one place and goes in the opposite direction. The first story arc deals with Jean Grey and Emma Frost's increasing tensions."

The rivalry between these two powerful psychics is something about which Jimenez is very excited.

"Everyone who loved [Chris] Claremont's run on Uncanny X-Men' will love the upcoming stuff," he noted.

Readers will be exposed to Emma's past and her dealings with the evil Hellfire Club as their White Queen, as well as duke it out with the super powerful Jean Grey/ Phoenix.

DC's mature imprint Vertigo has had many financial and critical successes since their beginning in 1993. Now marking its 10-year anniversary, there are an insurgence of new titles waiting to hit the sale racks over the course of 2003. One of them happens to be Jimenez's "Otherworld."

"This industry is slowly becoming similar to Hollywood," Jimenez explained. "When it's time to pitch a story, it has to be short, sweet and to the point. 'Otherworld' is put it in Hollywood terms, is 'The Real World' meets 'Lord of the Rings' meets 'Fron.' I'm so excited about it.

"In a nutshell, it's about a bunch of students from UCLA that are brought into the Otherworld. They are thrust into a war between savage capitalism and religious fundamentalism."

Jimenez conceived the idea many years ago and brought it about now by its relevance to current problems involving our world.

"It's an epic steeped in science fiction and fantasy based with a real world mythology," he said. "Both ideals on each side of [the comic's] war are bad for a true democracy."

One aspect about Jimenez's extremely successful run on "Wonder Woman" is that it garnered the attention of media outside of the comic book industry.

"The problem with comics in this country is that they are unfortunately still considered by many a child's medium," Jimenez said. "Superhero fantasy appeals to certain people."

Even though there are comics out there that are for a mature readership, the majority of the industry publishes superhero comics.

With the intriguing premise of "Otherworld" and Jimenez providing outstanding art for "New X-Men," the people who fail to realize this comic's potential will be missing out.

Hofstetter captures college hilarity with his book, 'Student Body Shots'

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

There are plenty of ways for a nervous incoming freshman to learn about college life. From the long, hot days of orientation to the numerous books and articles that give studying, organizing and socializing tips, the bookshelves and web pages of the college world are filled with an amalgam of information on how to survive college.

'Student Body Shots' By Steve Hofstetter Trafford

But for a truly insider's look at what it is to be a college student, Steve Hofstetter may have nailed it. "Student Body Shots" is a collection of columns that Hofstetter, a Columbia University graduate, wrote during his years in college.

The column, called "Observational Humor," began when Hofstetter emailed his friends with occasional witticisms and observations on life. Soon, those emails were forwarded, and Hofstetter turned them into columns, which gained popularity on the "CollegeHumor.com" website.

While the book is called "a sarcastic look at the best four to six years of your life," it is by no means an overly sardonic work. The observations are rarely stretched beyond reality for the sake of humor. Rather, Hofstetter's quips will ring true with any college student. He riffs on the numerous aspects of college life and society, such as "Hooking Up," "Professors," "Winter Break" and of course, "Instant Messenger," all names of some of the short essays inside.

"Student Body Shots" could have come off as a comedian whining about anything, he can just to get a laugh, but much of the humor comes from the day-to-day events in college life. Not that Hofstetter simply narrates a day in the life of a student. His sarcastic style is consistently funny, while still being spot-on.

In "Instant Messenger," one of the longer columns in the book, Hofstetter writes, "'lol' means 'laugh out loud' and 'roll' means 'rolling on the floor laughing,' but people constantly use them in the wrong place. 'No, I'm laughing, I swear. In fact, I am actually rolling on my floor, but I can miraculously still type.'"

One of the nicer things about "Student Body Shots" is the brevity of the columns. Rather than going on at length about the ethics of dating and the economic problems caused by college students only having $20 bills on them, because that's all that ATMs dispense. The jokes are quick, and Hofstetter moves rapidly to the next idea. While it isn't the stuff of great literature, it's clear Hofstetter is a stand-up comic, because that's the style of his writing.

While Hofstetter is a graduate of prestigious Columbia University, the book was edited to make sure very few inside Columbia jokes are included. Most of the material relates to any college student, and some is particularly suited for students at a northeastern school like UMass.

"Every March, I get excited for good weather, because of the phrase about March coming in like a lion and out like a lamb," Hofstetter writes. "But when you're in the Northeast, the phrase should be, 'In like a lion, having the lion hang out for a while and out like a slightly less ferocious lion.'"

There are some sections that won't apply to certain sections of the student population. For those who would rather spend a Friday night watching television than hitting Frat Row, sections like "Parties," "Greek Life" and "Bars"

Lack of consistency makes 'David Gale' contradictory and confusing

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Correspondent

The role of David Gale (Kevin Spacey) is a difficult one, considering the lack of consistency required of this character. Gale undergoes a serious moralistic makeover throughout the course of the movie. He begins his story as a very intelligent philosophy professor with supposed high workplace morale and devotion to Deathwatch, an anti-death penalty organization. As soon as this is established, he transforms into a desperate alcoholic, sleeping with his student and eventually abandoned by his family. He pulls himself together only to fall apart again. And finally the irony of his life occurs when he is put on death row for murdering his partner, Constance Harroway (Laura Linney). It is a basic structural advantage for a film to have a character undergo some sort of internal transformation. In Gale's case, however, his character takes a turn for the worse, and it is not conducive to the underlying liberal stance of the film.

It can be assumed the purpose of this film is to raise awareness and negative opinion of the death penalty. The journalist, Bitsey Bloom (Kate Winslet), who is assigned to interview Gale, changes her initial pro-death row stance to one of skepticism and finally outright opposition. Her change in opinion serves to represent the overall ambition of the writer and director to similarly change the viewer's perspective.

The very same lack of consistency in Gale's character is carried over to the moral, political values attempted by the plot, and therefore they become undermined. Due to a series of revelations at the end of the film, Gale's character does not go down as a martyr but perhaps more so as an overly zealous radical – one who goes too far to make his point, and therefore his point is not made. Anyone who is pro-death penalty when they see this film is likely to be more so when they leave.

In a debate with the supposed Governor of Texas, Gale quotes Ghandi when he says, "An eye for an eye leaves us all blind." The governor retaliates by saying, "I hate killing, and I will kill to stop it." At the time the governor's statement seems contradictory and foolish. However, in the end, it is Gale and Deathwatch whom seem to justify the governor's reasoning by their own contradictory actions.

The directorial mark given to the film also fluctuates sloppily from what at first appears to be an homage to the structure of "Silence of the Lambs" and then convolutes into a sort of warped political theme with Greek tragedian and philosophical themes.

This film would be an excellent revelatory experience, if it were based on the idea that radical fervor can, at times, escalate into something of a sadistic nature. Instead, Parker seems to advocate unnecessary death while trying to oppose it. Confused? Precisely the point; this film confuses itself.

Parker is most successful directing musical dramas (he directed both "Pink Floyd: The Wall" and "Evita"). This new film was overly ambitious and lacked the firm political stance it was assumed to have. However, if watched for nothing other than a suspenseful audience experience, "The Life of David Gale" triumphs.

Selby makes country sound sweet, without songs about pickup trucks

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

Let's be honest. The real American music is not techno, rap or even rock and roll. It's country. What other genre of music has so completely come from the United States? But if you think country music is all cowboy boots, tight jeans and square dancing, then you should give Mark Selby's newest album, "Dirt," a listen.

Mark Selby "Dirt" Vanguard

If you haven't heard of Mark Selby, that's OK. Likely, most people have been exposed to his work. Selby's song-writing credits include "There's Your Trouble" for the Dixie Chicks as well as other material for Trisha Yearwood and Wynonna Judd.

More notably, he's penned a string of hits for Kenny Wayne Shepherd, including "Deja Voodoo," "Slow Ride," "Last Goodbye" and the No. 1 smash "Blue on Black." Selby also co-wrote eight songs for Shepherd's "Live On" album.

With a soulful, Dave Matthews-like voice and twangy guitar riffs, "Dirt" speaks primarily to the college student age group. As is stated by Selby on his website, Murkselby.com, "I'm kind of drawn to things that scare me a little bit. This new record, for instance. It's about being an adult. It's about making informed choices – and accepting their consequences."

This South Dakota native has more range to his sound than most country bands. Throughout "Dirt," the power trio feels Mark has always preferred broadened to include subtle but effective contributions on keyboards. Along with the core line-up of Tony Nagy on bass and Chad Cromwell (Mark Knopfler, Bonnie Raitt) on drums, he's brought in Tim Lauer to lay down organ, piano and assorted electronic details. Renowned Stevie Ray Vaughan keyboardist Reese Wynans joins in on several tracks with additional keyboard parts as well.

Mark and his longtime co-writer Tia Sillers took some steps beyond their working relationship by getting married.

"We had a great friendship for a long time," he stated on his website. "It became romantic sometime in the past few years, so that's exciting. We see so many things on a very similar level, which is really rewarding, creatively and personally."

The couple co-wrote all of the songs on "Dirt."

This disk takes an honest look at the transitions and decisions one makes in the process of going from a young person to an adult. It is a refreshing tribute to morality, responsibility and basic sensibility.

TAAR are prothestic, but also a catchy, punky and fun listen

By Johnny Donaldson

The All-American Rejects "The All-American Rejects" Dreamworks

"Swing, swing, swing from the tangles off my heart is crushed by a former lover/ can you help me find a way/ to carry on again?

"Please just don't play with me/ my paper heart will bleed/ this wait for destiny won't do/ be with me, please/ I beseech you/ simple things that make you run away/ catch you if I can."

The All-American Rejects are a punk-pop quartet that makes Jimmy Eat World look like a bunch of hardcore headbangers, playing songs so scrubbed raw by heartbreak that Dashboard Confessional appears to be a bully in comparison. This is a group in which the pain and pleasures (mostly pain) of romance are so deeply felt that one imagines them scribbling earnest poetry into journals throughout their adolescence.

TAAR also display a major bent for Weezer in their brand of melodic emopop. Leading single "Swing, Swing" has the charismatic, unforgettable hooks of a song like "Buddy Holly," this self-titled debut sounds like one of Weezer's colored albums, minus Rivers Cuomo's sometimes misanthropic sarcasm.

The group formed around bassist and vocalist Tyson Ritter and guitarist, keyboardist and programmer Nick Wheeler in small town Oklahoma. Ritter, Wheeler and a drum loop ended up winning a battle of the bands of the contest. A young fan sent a demo to her brother, who worked in the publicity department of indie record label Doghouse Records. The CD was originally given a marginal release last fall before Dreamworks scooped up TAAR

Hofstetter is hilarious with book about college living will be uninteresting, but all of the columns contain at least a few passages that will make anyone chuckle, even if they've never tried to slip a fake ID past a bouncer.

"Student Body Shots" is more of a comedy book than a college survival book, but there are plenty of tips for college students that don't normally appear in annual newsmagazines and guidebooks. These tips, however, don't come in an authoritative voice of reason, but rather through osmosis. The anecdotes and observations in the columns say plenty about the easiest way to survive one's time on a college campus.

Perhaps the perfect example of the tone of "Student Body Shots" is the author of the foreword. Rather than find a professor or professional writer – according to a press release, Miami Herald columnist Dave Barry once called himself "the old Steve Hofstetter" – the publishers employed the services of Rider Strong – yes, that Rider Strong from the sitcom "Boy Meets World." Strong's short prelude is more than enough to entice anyone who grew up in the '90s into picking up the 99-page volume.

Hofstetter continues to write "Observational Humor," although it is more tailored to the working world now that the 23 year old is freelancing for various publications, including Sports Illustrated For Kids and ESPN.com. In addition to producing the sports satire site, "Hofstetter's Jerk of the Week" along with (brother?) Adam Hofstetter, he recently opened a comedy club in New York City.

"Student Body Shots," though, is the crown jewel of all of these achievements. While there aren't any strategies for acing that economics paper, it certainly belongs on any college student's bookshelf.

TAAR fake, but entertaining on new release

TAAR's first release is a bit pre-packaged, but the lyrics are heartfelt and offer a good deal of listening fun.

for a spiffy studio release.

"The All-American Rejects," as an album, comes off sounding like a glossier Saves the Day. The record was recorded without an actual drummer; the percussion was created via an electronic drum kit, which goes a long way to explain the techno-punk of "Don't Leave Me." Truth be told, the lack of an actual drummer (Chris Gaylor has since been added for live tours) robs TAAR of some of the vitality they could have had. The rhythm section consists of Ritter's bass walking hand in hand with computer-programmed beats, but the songs are without the fullness and sincerity that a live human being may have provided. The, at times tinny, percussion occasionally sounds fake, whereas having a drummer in the studio could have given the songs a more natural feel.

TAAR have an ear for pop and varnish their songs with a large armful of studio doodads. Orchestral strings swell on "Too Far Gone" and "Last Song." Dirge-like organs lead into the hyper infectious "Swing, Swing." Piano is overlaid onto "Your Star," while wedding bells tinkle on "Happy Endings." The drum kit is sometimes amped to give the songs an electronica-inspired backing. This may just be the shiniest, slickest example of a punk band ever.

So, is it bad? Not really. The songs – especially "Swing, Swing," "One More Sad Song" and "Drive Away" – have the contagious fervor of modern punk-pop. Ritter sings the songs like he means it, as if the sometimes heartfelt and occasionally sappy lyrics were the apt for him. The bopp-y energy is here, and so are the carload of hooks. But the sleek packaging may be a turn-off for some fans. TAAR are pop then expected, and the whole enterprise seems rather...plastic, as if The All-American Rejects were hand built by the record label. The songs sound like they come from a template – so do the lyrics at times. Ritter and Co. have learned the form very well, but don't capture the heart. The All-American Rejects can't be rejected out of hand, but the music could have been better.

Stone Cold Steve Austin and The Rock return again

This past week, everyone I know asked me if I was going to write about the return of Stone Cold Steve Austin and The Rock to World Wrestling Entertainment (WWE). I cannot stand either man, so my first instinct was to run as far as I could from the topic. Then I realized that their returns are news, and I would be remiss in my responsibilities as a columnist if I didn't write about it. That does not mean I have to like it though.

Corner to corner
Emilie Duggan-Hicks

Whether you are a wrestling fan or not – unless you have been living on another planet or simply have not made it to the movies in the past few years – you know who The Rock is. He has been all over the big screen the past couple of years, in movies like "The Mummy Returns" and "The Scorpion King." He has been on television on shows like Entertainment Tonight and Access Hollywood, being interviewed about his movies. In between shoots for his latest film, he has even managed to squeeze in a little wrestling here and there, coming back to the ring just long enough to tease the fans with the possibility of a permanent return. Alas, it was not meant to be because each time The Rock left once more to go on location for whatever film he was working on.

So, now he's back again, but for how long?

The past couple of months have been filled with The Rock popping up on SmackDown, teasing us from the Titantron (those giant TV screens on either side of the entry ramp) that finally the Rock has returned to wrestling. It seems likely he will be an active part of wrestling television through WrestleMania in March. After that, though, your guess as to how long he stays is as good as mine. I don't think even The Rock can say for certain.

"In some way, some form or fashion, I will always be involved in WWE – always. That's inevitable," he says in the latest edition of WWE magazine.

But what does that mean exactly? Along with the frequent appearing and disappearing acts he likes to pull, The Rock presents ambiguous comments – like the one above – that have wrestling fans jeering him every time he enters the arena. In a time when it is hard enough to support the wrestling product in general, the last thing fans have interest in is supporting a part-time wrestler.

Just so we're clear here, this is not my opinion about The Rock and his actions. My opinion is probably not fit for print. That's the opinion of the majority of WWE fans out there who see The Rock as a sell out. He dared to take some time off to go make movies, so the fans are going to jeer him when he makes his return.

Now, supporting a man who walked out on the WWE and turned out to be a wife-beater? That is another story altogether.

The fans that heckle The Rock when he makes his entrance are the same fans that blow the roof off the arena when Stone Cold Steve Austin returns. Why? Didn't Austin do the same thing as The Rock, leaving the company just as abruptly last summer?

Apparently, the fans can easily overlook that Steve Austin flat-out turned his back on the company – and the fans – and he has been welcomed back with open arms. Eight months ago, Austin walked out of the arena during a live, televised show. For a while, at least, fans thought it was part of the storyline, something devised by his good friend (and WWE Chairman) Vince McMahon to boost ratings. The Stone Cold truth, however, is that Steve Austin walked away from the ring because he didn't like the way things were being handled behind the scenes.

"There were a lot of things going on," Austin said in a recent interview on WWE.com. "Some things that will never be mentioned. So I left and that's pretty much the way it went."

That is a great attitude, Steve. You are just the kind of wrestler that parents everywhere want their kids to admire. Add that to the fact that he is an admitted wife-beater, and you have a real model citizen.

The Rock has become the biggest supporter of his own hype. It is painful to watch him on screen, touting his accomplishments. Well, someone has to say he is taking Hollywood by storm. His movies sure aren't saying much of anything. As for Stone Cold Steve Austin, he will forever be branded as what he is – a wife-beating, beer drinking redneck that threw a temper tantrum because things were not going his way. Only in sports entertainment could you walk away from your obligations and still be given a hero's reception upon your return.

Trying to decide which man to cheer or jeer is trying to choose between the lesser of two evils. I'll just change the channel.

Pete Rose fails in bid for Canadian Baseball HOF

TORONTO (AP) – Even when he was put on a Hall of Fame ballot, Pete Rose failed to get elected.

Rose missed out on making the Canadian Baseball Hall of Fame on Monday, falling short of the necessary 75 percent vote from the selection committee.

Baseball's career hits leader, who spent part of the 1984 season with Montreal and got career hit No. 4,000 with the Expos, was among 46 nominees for the Canadian hall.

Former Toronto star Joe Carter, Canadian pitcher Kirk McCaskill, administrator Richard Belec and the Vancouver Asahi team were elected. The hall, which will hold its induction July 26 in St. Marys, did not release the vote totals.

"I think that our selection committee is a microcosm of society," Canadian hall president Tom Valcke said. "I think North America is perched [illegible] and hoping to forgive Pete Rose. He's just got to fess up. Talk to Bill Clinton, talk to Ben Johnson – [illegible] he's forgiving continent."

Calls to Rose's Florida home, his agent, Gaby Spreen, and his agent Warren Greene, were not immediately returned.

Rose is ineligible for the ballot for the National Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, N.Y., because of his permanent ban from baseball. He agreed to the ban in August 1989 following an investigation of his gambling. Bud Selig and Rose have spoken about possible reinstatement, but the commissioner won't say when or if he will take any action.

Tony Riviera, chairman of the newly formed Canadian Baseball League, nominated Rose for the Canadian hall. Rose's autographed batting gloves used for the historic hit are on display in the museum along with photos.

Rose joined the Expos at the start of the 1984 season and hit .254 with 25 RBIs in 95 games. He played first base and outfield.

Carter hit the ninth-inning homer off Mitch Williams that won Game 6 of the 1993 World Series, giving the Blue Jays their second straight title. The only other player who hit a Series-ending homer was Pittsburgh's Bill Mazeroski in Game 7 of the 1960 World Series against the New York Yankees.

Carter played 1,039 games for Toronto and finished with 396 career homers and 1,445 RBIs.

"The seven years I spent there in Toronto were fabulous," Carter told the Canadian network CTV from Kansas City, Mo. "And to top my whole career off, to be elected to the Canadian Hall of Fame is an honor that I will cherish for the rest of my life."

McCaskill spent 12 years in the majors, playing for California and the Chicago White Sox from 1985 to 1996. He had a career record of 106-108 and is second to Ferguson Jenkins (284) in major league wins by Canadians.

Belec is a longtime official who was president of Baseball Canada from 1994-96. The Asahi club was a Japanese-Canadian team in Vancouver that won several championships before World War II.

Since its inception in 1985, the hall has inducted 58 members, including Jenkins, Jackie Robinson and Gary Carter.

Softball sweeps three top 20 teams

Emily Robustelli smacked two homeruns in three games, as UMass won the Leadoff Classic Title.

lected the win, going 6.1 innings while giving up six hits, three runs and added one K.

With the title in sight, the Minutewomen faced their toughest opponent in No. 11 Florida State. Once this game got going, it came down to a pitching duel between UMass ace Kelli Arnold, the tournament MVP, and FSU's Casey Hunter, ACC Player of the Week.

The game was scoreless through two and a half innings. Then Robustelli struck again with her second homer of the tournament – this one a solo shot and the only UMass hit in the game. The dinger gave the Maroon and White a 1-0 lead in the low scoring affair after three innings.

The lead held up until the top sixth, when FSU's Jessica van Linder doubled Shandra Colzie across the plate. The stage was set going into the bottom of the sixth inning tied at a run apiece.

In the bottom of the sixth, UMass wasn't able to get anything going and were down after the first three hitters. FSU's Billie Ann Gay was able to pull off a double, but the rest of the Seminoles were unable to capitalize, going scoreless.

The first batter, Cross, worked the count and was able to pull off the walk. Denise Dennis came in to pinch run for Cross after the base on balls. Dennis advanced to second on Kelley's sacrifice, and then advanced to third on a passed ball. After Holtz grounded out to Hunter, there were two outs and a runner on third. During the next at-bat, Hunter threw a wild pitch and Dennis crossed the plate for the win and the title.

"The Florida State game [came down to] who was going to make a mistake, and we're glad they did," Sortino said. "You had two great pitchers pitching two great games. I thought we put a lot of shots right at them, or in Emily's case, hit it out."

Tennis continues to struggle with losses to Army and Brown

By Anna Edwards
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team fell to Army on Friday after the final set in the No. 6 singles decided the closest match of the day.

The Minutewomen went on to lose to Brown on Saturday. The losses place the Maroon and White at 0-3 for its spring schedule and 1-4 overall.

In their first home game of the spring semester, the Minutewomen hosted Army on Friday at the Bay Road Tennis Center in a closely contested match. The Maroon and White entered the match with confidence, knowing that it could go either way.

However, it fell to Army 4-3.

As expected, it was anyone's match with the Minutewomen beginning proceedings with a 1-0 lead after the doubles.

Junior Iafra Depontes teamed up with sophomore Stephanie Price to defeat sophomores Marissa Limsaco and Lyndsey Nott 8-5, while freshman Camilla Knight and her partner, junior captain Susan Hyams, beat opponents Lauren Leftin and Pant Chavez 8-5.

Knight suffered a groin strain at the beginning of the week that kept her out of the singles and affected her performance in the Brown match on Saturday, which she lost 0-6, 0-0.

"This [groin strain] made it a bonus to win," Knight said. "It was the second time that we played together, and we came together well. Susan and I seemed to click, and this was an important match."

In the singles, Depontes, who is recovering from shoulder surgery, defeated Leftin 1-6, 6-4, 6-3 in the No. 4 singles position. Hyams, meanwhile, defeated Nott 6-2, 6-2 in the No. 5 singles position.

The competition was tied 3-3 going into the final match where freshman Jana Bartoloni met the Black Knights. Chavez Bartoloni dropped the first set 6-2, but proved totally dominant in the second set, taking it 6-0.

However, after a closely fought final set, Bartoloni fell 6-4.

With Bartoloni and freshman Dorothy Iwanowicz taking their respective opponents to three sets, it showed how close an opponent Army was for the Maroon and White.

"It went down to who could pull it out under pressure," Hyams said. "Army was tougher, but we were pretty even, and everyone played really well."

The Minutewomen faced tougher competition from the Ivy League's Brown on Saturday in Providence, R.I.

The Brown Bears dominated throughout all matches to a victorious 7-0 result.

No. 1 singles player for the Minutewomen, sophomore Sasha Edelstein fell to opponent freshman Yelena Klurfield, 6-2, 6-3.

Brown sophomore Kerry Meath defeated No. 2 singles player Price for the Maroon and White, Price, 6-4, 6-2.

"The Brown match was a learning experience for what to work on," Hyams said.

After the close match against Army and with the experience gained from another Ivy League game, this can help the Minutewomen pick up their momentum while heading toward their goal of the season, the A-10 Championships in April.

The Maroon and White will return to action to play Dartmouth on Thursday at Hanover N.H.

Young lefty no trade bait for Boston

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) – Casey Fossum has just eight victories in the majors. Bartolo Colon had 21 last season.

Yet the Boston Red Sox, it was Fossum. They wouldn't trade him to Montreal for Colon, who would have joined Pedro Martinez and Derek Lowe in a powerhouse rotation with three 20-game winners.

"It shows they really have that much confidence in me," Fossum said Monday. "They could have had Colon, who everybody wanted last year in the middle of the season on the Red Sox."

So the Red Sox have Fossum as their No. 4 starter. In five spring as part of the rotation from the start of camp – and Colon is with the Chicago White Sox after a three-team trade on Jan. 15 involving Montreal and the New York Yankees.

Until the trade, Fossum didn't know what to think.

He wanted to stay with Boston, the organization he's been with his entire career. It was a good sign that the Red Sox didn't trade for Colon last season.

Fossum is a talented left-handed starter, a rare commodity these days. But he kept hearing his name in trade rumors. He and the Red Sox didn't want to rush him for Kevin Millwood, who eventually went from Atlanta to Philadelphia.

The Colon talk kept going, focusing on a deal that would send Fossum and third baseman Shea Hillenbrand to the Expos.

"It was tough. You try not to think about it or worry about it," Fossum said. "But it's you three or three people talking, your family. People saying 'I saw they wouldn't trade you for Millwood.' I saw Colon's name every day."

It makes you feel better when the Red Sox say, willing to deal part with you for those types of pitchers.

Red Sox general manager Dan Duquette said the Red Sox have an advantage because it would limit interest in making deals. But he knew what he had to become a left-hander who won't have freak-out as Jesse Pla Red Sox lasted after the 2005 season.

Could not be a free agent after 2005.

Great Value. Great Plan.

Leadoff Champs

Softball takes prestigious title

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Besides the College World Series, the NCAA Leadoff Classic is the most prestigious softball tournament of the year, and the Massachusetts softball team was the talk of the country. The Minutewomen were one of five teams to post a 5-0 record and won the championship title due to their impressive run differential against opponents (15-3).

The Maroon and White came into the weekend 25th in the nation and went on to defeat three straight higher-ranked opponents. UMass rolled past No. 18 Oregon State, 7-0, then continued its dominance against No. 20 Pacific and 4-0 Arizona. The third and final game was an intense pitching duel against No. 11 Florida State, in which UMass was able to capitalize on a fatal last-inning error to capture the win. Coach Elaine Sortino spoke highly of her team's attitude and performance.

"I think it's the mentality of our players," Sortino said. "They have very, very strong mental toughness, handle adversity very well and are poised."

On Friday, the Maroon and White got off to a quick start against Oregon State when shortstop Emily Robustelli smacked a solo home run for the team in the first at-bat of the game. Following the Robustelli blast, pitcher Kelsi Holtz singled in second baseman Hilary Puglia.

Leading 2-1 after an inning, eight UMass batters managed just two hits, but were able to generate three runs, giving the Minutewomen a 5-1 lead.

The game was called in the top of the sixth due to rain and wasn't finished until the next afternoon. The delay was unfortunate, as UMass held its 5-1 lead for the victory as both teams were scoreless in the final innings.

Second baseman Jaime Holtz, who held the Beavers to only two hits and one run while striking out five through seven innings, UMass also set a season-high with 10 hits in the game, while only one player with an at-bat didn't reach base.

"Success is about our team," Sortino said. "We are good at pitching, offense and defense, and that's the team we think it takes to reward one person. That's a nice place to be."

On the second day, it was time for a pair of freshmen to shine.

After Puglia doubled and first baseman Brandi Cross reached freshman third baseman Katie Jo Kells connected for a three-run shot that was first collegiate homer, to give UMass the momentum and the 3-0 lead. In the second inning, Puglia continued her clutch play, 3-for-3, two RBIs, with two-out within two-RBI single, making the score 5-1.

The Maroon and White, enjoyed the rest of the way to the win. It was the last start freshman pitcher Jenna Busa collected, as she worked hard all year so we were fortunate to win on day three," UMass coach Rene Lawrence said. "It was a ferocious comeback."

Individual honors at the Maroon and White also reflected a successful weekend.

Senior Ryan Zaucha was named most outstanding performer of the meet for the men's competition and was named to the All-Conference team, where he was joined by fellow senior Minutemen, Tommy Keane, Justin Houck, junior Connor Townsend and sophomore Dylan Smith.

"[Smith] "come a long way in his four years," Yarsworth said. "The senior will leave their mark."

It was, however, a team competition Yarsworth said. "It was a total team effort everyone contributed."

In the 31 events in the competition the Minutemen tallied 70 points in only two, both of which came on the first day.

Yarsworth was named men's A-10 Coach of the Year for the fourth year in a row. It is the fifth time he has received this accolade as coach. The Maroon and White Yarsworth was quick to point out. His coaching accolade doesn't mean that much to me. It's the kids I'm pleased for. They did everything that was asked of them."

For the Minutewomen, who finished fifth overall, Katie Allery was named most outstanding diver and diving coach Mandi Dixon was named women's A-10 Diving Coach of the Year.

Allery, who claimed gold in the 11 dive 3-meter event with a school record total of 468.60 points and the six-dive 1-meter event (270.40 points), was the sole Minutewomen named to the All-Conference team and was also the lone team member to claim gold in the three-day competition. More importantly, her score in the 3-meter event was high enough to qualify her for the NCAA 'B' cut, which means she will now be considered for the national championships.

For the victorious Minutemen, six individuals placed first over the duration of the meet.

Zaucha captured gold in the 200-yard backstroke in a time of 1:50.20. Dylan Smith won the 200-yard butterfly in an almost identical time to Zaucha (1:51.20).

In their final meets for the Maroon and White, Keane and Houck placed first in the 400- and 200-yard individual medley, respectively.

The other Minuteman to finish first was Connor Townsend who won the 50-yard butterfly in a time of 50.60 seconds.

Other strong performances for the Maroon and White came courtesy of Zaucha, who finished second behind Houck in the 200-yard IM at 1:52.01. In the 500-yard freestyle, three Minutemen finished in the top eight with Smith placing third, Keane fifth and senior Rob Bellamy seventh.

Junior Pete Tawczyniski finished third in both the 100- and 200-yard backstroke events and there were second place finishes for both the 200-yard freestyle and 400-yard medley relay teams.

In diving, junior Logan Akmar finished third in the 1-meter dive with a score of 256.30 points and sophomore Brandon Doane finished second in the 3-meter dive with a score of 413.75 points.

For the Minutewomen other notable performances came from freshman Aimee Bourassa, who placed seventh in the 500-yard freestyle in 5:09.26.

Sophomore Colleen Wasson placed fourth in the 100- and 200-yard breaststroke and eighth in the 200-yard individual medley. Junior Diana Alberti placed fourth in the 100-yard butterfly and sixth in the 200-yard event.

The women's competition was dominated by Richmond, which retained its title by winning 13 events in the process and finished more than 150 points ahead of second place.

The Spiders broke eight A-10 records for good measure. Six of those records were shared between freshman Brooke Boncher and sophomore Mary Adams.

In light of their achievements, Adams was named most outstanding performer and Boncher picked up most outstanding rookie, while Richmond coach Matt Kredich was name Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year for the second straight season to complete a clean sweep of the awards for the Spiders.

The championships marked the culmination of the 2002-2003 swimming and diving season for both men's and women's squads. They will return to action in October.

Sophomore pitcher Kelli Arnold was named the Most Outstanding Player of the Leadoff Classic this weekend. The Minutewomen topped three top 20 teams en route to the tournament title.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had its first game of the season on Saturday, defeating Holy Cross 10-5. The game was decided in the second half after an opening stanza that was, as coach Carrie Bolduc said, "slow, sloppy and wet."

The Minutewomen struck first with the help of junior Hope Zelinger, who scored her first of three goals nearly five minutes into the game. The game was soon tied with a goal from Lady Crusader Katie Britt.

UMass	10
Holy Cross	5

The Maroon and White pulled ahead with two goals from senior Maura McGarrity and sophomore Leslie Pollock. Once again, Holy Cross evened the score with two unanswered goals to finish the half.

"We played a tentative first half," Bolduc said. "It looked like we had first game jitters."

The Minutewomen had trouble putting together a strong offensive push in the beginning of the game and were not happy settling for a tie at the half.

"We weren't poised on attack... the speed of the attack dictates whether we score," Bolduc said.

The Minutewomen were hesitant with their possessions in a half that lacked momentum from both squads.

But the second half came, and the Maroon and White was a different team.

Within the first five minutes of the half, the Minutewomen netted three goals and built the momentum they needed to roll the rest of the half.

"We emphasized possession... they had more focus in the second half," Bolduc said.

Even with the barrage of goals that the Maroon and White tallied, Bolduc was more impressed with her defensive players.

"The defense in the second half was great," she said. "We had a couple of players step up."

Sophomore goaltender Joey Rubin and defenders Kristen St. Hilare, Andrea Valachovic and Jackie Nesbitt helped to hold back the Lady Crusader attack in the half. The group allowed two goals through in the half, which wasn't enough to slow the energized UMass attack.

The Maroon and White got help on offense as junior Tracey Drown netted two goals in the half – one of which came in the first five minutes when the Minutewomen snipers were seemingly firing at will.

"[Drown] really elevated her play and leadership... she really rose to the occasion," Bolduc said.

Drown was complemented by goals from Zelinger and Lydia Robinson, who scored two each during the half.

Bolduc was not happy with the first half of play but sees there is definite team unity.

"The whole team chemistry is there," she said. "We need to take a second look at the game and figure some things out."

Swimming wins A-10

Last day dominance surges UMass to title

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team captured its third straight Atlantic 10 conference title this weekend, in Buffalo, NY.

The Minutemen routed St. Bonaventure by 41 points after they left by 11 going into the final day of the meet. The champion's lips but a strong performance on the last day gave them the title by a score of 809.75-673.

"The swimmers have worked hard all year so we were fortunate to win on day three," UMass coach Rene Lawrence said. "It was a ferocious comeback."

Individual honors at the Maroon and White also reflected a successful weekend.

Minutewomen continue freefall with Temple loss

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The Massachusetts women's basketball team suffered its fifth straight loss and its seventh consecutive defeat on the road, as the Temple Owls (11-14, 7-7 Atlantic 10) ran away to a 47-42 victory over the Minutewomen (12-13, 4-10 A-10) on Sunday.

Temple	47
UMass	42

Senior Jennifer Butler led all scorers with 17 points and grabbed 16 rebounds for her 21st double-double of the season. Temple's Stacey Smalls made the difference, however, exploding for all of her 16 points in the second half.

The Minutewomen went on a 9-3 run to tie the game at 36 with four minutes to go, but Smalls quickly took the momentum back with a pair of loud 3-pointers from the top of the arc.

"I was kind of rushing," Smalls said of her pair of treys. "I just tried to take my time at the end and hit my shots."

Down by two at the start of the second half, the Maroon and White took the lead back on a crisply-executed play that gave Judit Zsedenyi all the time she needed to convert a 3-pointer from the baseline.

UMass couldn't hold the edge, though, and trailed by as many as eight down the stretch. Smalls made nine of Temple's final 11 points in her last game at the Liacouras Center.

Both teams began to hit their shots in the second half and traded baskets for the first 10 minutes. But that ended when the Owls' Cynthia Jordan hit a 3-pointer from the top of the arc to start Temple on an 8-0 run.

Smalls made the difference in the first half as well, nailing a 3-pointer from the wing with 10 seconds before the half, giving the Owls an 18-16 advantage heading into the locker room.

The Minutewomen held a lead for much of the first half, but it never got above five. Neither team managed much offensive power, as the Minutewomen shot 25.9 percent from the field, while the Owls only managed 29.2 percent.

Butler was well on her way to her double-double with seven boards in the first 9:30 of play.

Both teams came out of the blocks sloppy, alternating traveling calls up and down the court. The Minutewomen took three quick fouls, two of which were attributed to Nekole Smith. The only impressive player on the court was Butler, who had eight of the first 10 points for the Minutewomen.

"The kids did an excellent job in the half court," Temple coach Dawn Staley said of her troops. "Our record isn't any indication of where we are as a basketball team."

UMass had just one player in double-figure scoring (Butler), and with Smith on the bench for 16 minutes, there were numerous holes in the Minutewoman offense.

"Our perimeter shooters were 2-for-24." Maroon and White coach Marnie Dacko said. "We had open looks inside and outside. It comes to being able to put the ball in the basket."

While Dacko attributed much of the loss to her team's inadequacies, she highlighted the discrepancies in fouls called. A number of fouls occurred that had the first-year coach fuming at officials, including the call that sent Smith to the bench for all but five minutes of the first half.

"Part of the problem is that we can't get to the foul line," Dacko said. "[Butler] is doing what she has to do to draw fouls. And with [Smith] out, we need her. It's always key that she's in the lineup, because she has the outside game."

Temple, in second place in the A-10 East, can do no worse than a tie for the second-place spot this season, with Fordham and Rhode Island each at five wins, with two games remaining.

The Minutewomen, meanwhile, drop to fifth in the East and are in danger of slipping to the cellar if St. Bonaventure can manage two wins in its final pair.

SGA to look at controversial 'slush fund'

Student Government Association President David Carr is expected to address the SGA regarding a supposed "slush fund."

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association President David Carr will address the SGA tonight on rumors of a "slush fund" within the SGA Programming Board. Several members of the SGA have been investigating the signature responsibility of the programming board's primary funds.

The programming board of the SGA was developed and passed by the 2001-2002 Senate in an effort to establish campus-wide events through the SGA. However, it has been inactive throughout the 2002-2003 school year, resulting in much of its funding to be allocated to area governments. Funding specifically was allocated to events in early fall of 2002 within the Orchard Hill and Southwest residential areas.

Orchard Hill Governor Mark Morrison said that the SGA sponsored two dances in the fall, one in Orchard Hill and one in Southwest, and that they were paid in full by SGA accounts. Morrison said that he had heard the money came from the Programming Board.

Morrison said that speculation has surfaced that Secretary of Registry Justin Provincher, the chair of the Programming Board, and Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Tom Fleenor met and turned the account over to Carr. He admitted that this was a legal decision due to the committee's no call for quorum rule in their charter, but said he saw problems with it.

"I don't think one sole individual should have control of $40,000," Morrison said, "Especially when no one from the committee was even notified that there was a meeting."

Carr said that allegations that the Programming Board's budget is a slush fund are inaccurate. He said that he does not have control over the Programming Board's funds and that any money spent by the Programming Board was decided upon by members of the Executive Cabinet.

"The board never met, and members did not transfer the Programming Board's account funds over to my name," Carr said.

Carr said that the SGA funded two dances, with 3,000 people attending the one in Orchard Hill and over 2,000 attending the one in Southwest.

"We also gave money to put on a Rape Defense Course through Public Safety this fall that had 80 women in attendance, and this has been the only money spent this year," he said.

Carr said that issues surrounding the Programming Board have been an ongoing problem within the SGA.

"The Programming Board is based on priority," Carr said. "For the past two years under former Presidents Jeff Howe and John Sheehan, the Programming Board dealt with the same issues, and money was distributed by them and no one questioned that."

Carr questioned the timing of the allegations surfacing.

"Now two weeks before elections I'm being questioned, and all we've done is put on three quality programming events that benefited students," Carr said. "This is by no means a slush fund. It was money respectfully distributed by the SGA to benefit students and this is ultimately a Senate issue."

Senate Speaker Dan Saunders said that rumors of the illegal funding and transferring of money was hearsay and that allegations have stemmed from a lack of communication and accountability on behalf of the SGA.

"I've heard a lot of rumors about this slush fund, but this slush fund was given to the Programming Board last year under former President John Sheehan's cabinet and it was approved by the Senate," Saunders said. "The reason why there is a problem is because they never established a need for quorum for meetings within their charter."

Saunders said that theoretically, two individuals of the Executive Cabinet could decide where up to $40,000 is spent. According to Saunders, past issues caused the Board to fall apart.

"Money has been distributed to them [area governments] under President Dave Carr's signature," Saunders said.

Several members of the SGA have expressed concerns as the Programming Board's budget has been overturned under Carr's responsibility.

Saunders said that he did not understand people's implications of a slush fund because the money spent has been out their since the beginning of the year.

"It just shows that people are accountable for money spent, and it's something we've stressed all year long."

TransWorld film festival tonight in Student Union

Sports films on display

By Sara-Megan Walsh
Collegian Correspondent

The TransWorld Undeclared Film Tour will be hitting the University of Massachusetts and giving a free showing of its newest film featuring extreme sports documentaries and films

The TransWorld Undeclared Film Tour is visiting more than 50 colleges from Jan. 6 – Mar. 6, 2003. The tour exhibits the latest in extreme sport films. The show is a 60-minute long compilation of stunts, tricks and falls as performed by a crew of professional and upcoming extreme snowboarders and skiers. They will perform to a mixed soundtrack of songs by various artists including KISS, Jimmy Eat World, and Swollen Members.

Mike McEntire of Mack Dawg Productions produced the first half of the film featuring snowboarders Jeremy Jones, Peter Line, Devun Walsh, and the 2003 Winter X-games Gold Medallist Shaun White. They were filmed performing their tricks on the snow of Oregon, Utah, Northern California and Canada.

Johnny Decesare of Poor Boyz Productions produced the second half of the film featuring extreme skiers JF Cusson, CR Johnson, John Olsson, Mike Douglas and the winner of the 2003 Winter X-Games gold medal, Tanner Hall. Filming locations for this half of the film not only include Tahoe, California, Vail and Colorado, but also numerous other places on the East Coast.

Alongside the film presentation, sponsors for the TransWorld Undeclared Film Tour, Intel and Microsoft, will have an interactive station for students to try out demos of the newest, cutting-edge digital video applications on Allenware laptop PCs.

The interactive software demos are conjoined with a contest, " You Be the Director." Students who want to try their hands at directing have until Apr. 1, 2003 to edit footage and music from the website www.findyourpower.com using the application Windows Movie Maker 2 to create 30-second to 60-second videos.

These videos will then be judged in the contest on basis of originality and editing techniques for the chance to win the grand prize of a state-of-the-art video editing kit from Microsoft and Intel including: an Alienware Pentium 4 PC, Canon Elura 40 MC DV Camcorder, Windows Plus! Digital Media Ed and a Neptune Mediashare Pro membership for one year.

For the non-artistic, there will be a free raffle at the film showing for those in attendance. There's a chance to win various prizes from skiing and snowboarding apparel or equipment to the big prize of the night –a Creative Nomad MUVO MP3 player.

"TransWorld Undeclared" will be in the Student Union Ballroom tonight from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Earthquake rocks Western China killing hundreds

By Audra Ang
Associated Press

KASHGAR, China (AP) - Hundreds of aftershocks rocked western China on Tuesday, claiming more lives a day after a major earthquake crumpled thousands of homes and schools. The death toll rose to at least 266 people, with another 2,000 injured, state media reported.

The latest deaths included rescue workers who were struck by debris as they pulled victims from the rubble during aftershocks, and residents who succumbed to their injuries from Monday's powerful earthquake, the official Xinhua News Agency reported. Chinese officials put the magnitude of Monday's quake at 6.8, while the U.S. Geological Survey recorded it at 6.3.

More than 500 aftershocks jolted the area overnight, including one before dawn that registered magnitude 5, Xinhua said. Aftershocks could be felt as far away as Kashgar, about 180 miles from the hardest-hit part of the remote region.

"I felt about three and they lasted for a minute each. Everything was shaking," said Kashgar resident Ani Abdul.

The disaster zone stretched through an isolated western section of the Xinjiang region near China's mountainous border with Kyrgyzstan. Xinhua said nearly 9,000 houses and hundreds of other buildings were destroyed.

About 600 of the injured were hospitalized in serious condition, officials said.

Rescuers dug through debris by hand on Tuesday, fearing that heavy equipment could further injure survivors, said a volunteer in the hardest-hit village, Chengku Qiake. Officials said 90 percent of that town's 30,000 people were forced to leave damaged homes.

The government sent 9,000 tents to the disaster zone, but there was no immediate figure on how many people were left homeless in the subfreezing temperatures.

Almost all the dead were in Bachu County, where flimsy building construction seemed to have contributed to the death toll, officials said. The neighboring county of Jiashi was closer to the epicenter but suffered little damage; its homes have been reinforced following severe quakes in recent years.

Relief supplies and rescue teams with search dogs began arriving early Tuesday from Beijing, about 1,750 miles to the east. People in the regional capital of Urumqi donated clothing and supplies. Businesses in Xinjiang collected $500,000 for relief.

Some of those killed were children whose schools collapsed in the tremors. Xinhua said 900 classrooms were wrecked. Officials said at least 12 students died.

Photos in state newspapers Tuesday showed residents bundled against the winter cold standing in the street alongside salvaged belongings. A wrecked schoolhouse was shown with one cracked brick wall left standing, displaying tattered posters of Karl Marx and Mao Zedong.

Earthquakes are common in Xinjiang, especially its far west, which includes the foothills of the Pamir and Tianshan mountains.

Xu Jing, who moved to Kashgar from Jiashi in 1997, said aftershocks woke him twice overnight. "I'm used to it," he said.

The Communist Party leader for Xinjiang, the deputy secretary of China's Cabinet and the deputy minister of civil affairs were at the scene supervising rescue work, state television said.

The Greek government announced it would send $215,000 in emergency aid. The China Daily newspaper said the Chinese and Xinjiang Red Cross societies sent winter clothes, quilts and other aid worth $55,000.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Kong Quan said China was "very grateful," for humanitarian aid and expressions of condolence from foreign governments.

China's deadliest earthquake in modern history struck the northeastern city of Tangshan on July 28, 1976, killing some 240,000 people. Its magnitude was measured at 7.8 to 8.2.

Governor Romney addresses state

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) - State aid payments to cities and towns would drop 5 percent, or $252 million, with wealthier communities taking the largest hit under a budget plan outlined by Gov. Mitt Romney on Tuesday.

The plan would also force welfare recipients with preschool children to work to receive benefits and reward state workers for performance, not seniority.

Romney's plan, which will be unveiled in detail on Wednesday, also consolidates state agencies, hikes some fees, and protects core services such as homeless shelters, child care and some welfare programs.

Romney called new taxes "a dead end street" and said his budget plan won't include tax hikes.

"Our state government spends tens of billions of dollars each year. Properly channeled, these dollars can be a powerful economic engine," Romney said. "Let's rev up that engine."

Many of the specifics in the 15-minute speech, broadcast live on television and radio, have already been announced by Romney, including proposals to combine courts, consolidate health and human service agencies and require the state's higher education campuses to share administrative functions.

The House and Senate are already preparing their own spending plans and the competing versions will eventually be reconciled into a single state budget blueprint.

Romney said his plan would create a new Executive Office of Education to oversee public education programs. He repeated his pledge to fight efforts to roll back the voter-approved ballot question ending bilingual education.

Romney addresses state budget

He also said he wants to end the practice of protecting jobs of state workers who have seniority, which he said results in workers doing jobs for which they are not qualified. Romney said he also wants to categorize government supervisors as management, not union workers.

Romney said his proposals will save the state $2 billion a year. Savings associated with program cuts he has already outlined total less than one-tenth of that figure, according to Romney's own estimates.

Observers said they don't know how Romney came up with the $2 billion figure.

"Two billion seems much, much too high and unrealistic," said Michael Widmer of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation. "It's hard to know how he reached it."

Sen. Mark Montigny, D-New Bedford was more blunt, calling the $2 billion claim "disingenuous."

"It's sort of like waiting for from heaven to assume that there's $2 billion in this proposal," he said.

Democratic leaders, including House Speaker Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, said it's too early to pass judgment. "Until we see the specifics as he rolls out the budget, and until we have an opportunity to examine and analyze that, it's all a little premature," Finneran said.

Democrats will fight some of Romney's plans, such as rolling back prescription drug programs for seniors and cutting school building funds, said state Sen. Cheryl Jacques, D-Needham.

"We're going to disagree with him when it makes sense," she said.

Romney's defenders credited him with a bold vision. "I think he has done a masterful job of at least saying to the Democratic leaders - OK, you put forward a plan," said Sen. Brian Lees, R-East Longmeadow.

Ron Hollander, president of the Massachusetts Hospital Association, said the lack of health care specifics in Romney's speech was a "serious omission."

The budget plan is expected to undergo tough scrutiny when it is released Wednesday. It is only the first step on a long road to come up with a plan to close an estimated $3 billion spending gap for the fiscal year that begins July 1.

The House and Senate will propose their own versions of the budget, reach a compromise and send it to Romney, who can veto individual line items. Lawmakers can then override those vetoes.

Romney said he would be "flexible" with lawmakers, even as he threw down a gauntlet.

"There will be an enormous effort to continue the old ways, with year after year tax increases," Romney said. "But I will fight for bold change."

Romney delivered the speech standing in front a blue banner emblazoned with the logo "Common Sense for the Commonwealth."

The speech breaks with tradition. Typically, a new governor's inaugural address serves the same function as a State of the State. The speech is the second by Romney broadcast live since he took office.

Band members of Great White will testify in R.I.

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Members of the band on stage the night a deadly fire erupted at a nightclub are planning to testify early next week before a grand jury investigating whether criminal charges should be filed in the inferno that killed 97 people.

Byron Hontas, a publicist for the band Great White, said Tuesday the members were cooperating with authorities in Rhode Island and would "continue to provide whatever assistance they're able to." Hontas, speaking from Los Angeles, said he didn't know exactly when the band would return to the state.

The grand jury was scheduled to convene Wednesday, law enforcement authorities said on the condition of anonymity. Investigators are trying to determine who is to blame for the fire that was apparently sparked by the band's pyrotechnics last Thursday. Flames swept through the West Warwick club, The Station, in a matter of minutes.

It could not be immediately determined if the club's owners, brothers Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, also have received subpoenas. Their attorney, Kathleen Hagerty, didn't return calls seeking comment Tuesday, and the attorney general's office declined comment on the issue.

Police searched the Narragansett home of Michael Derderian on Sunday, according to a law enforcement source who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Meanwhile, Gov. Don Carcieri said Monday that 93 of the nightclub victims had been identified. He also said there was a discrepancy between the number of people reported missing and those confirmed dead, and search crews using dogs were expected to go over the charred ruins again to look for bodies.

The fire also injured nearly 190 people; about 60 remain hospitalized, including 39 in critical condition.

Before the news conference, Carcieri said he went to a hospital where he met the family of a young woman who had gone to the club with eight others. Only four of them survived. The woman lost her fiancee and her brother.

"This is a tough, very, very tough process and the families and the impacts of this thing are rippling throughout the state," Carcieri said.

The band Great White returned to the Los Angeles area a few days after the fire without its guitarist, Ty Longley, who died in the blaze.

Hontas, the band's publicist, said the four remaining members aren't planning any performances or tours. "They're still in shock and distraught. It's not any easier today than it was last week," he said Tuesday.

Attorney General Patrick Lynch has said he does not believe the Derderians have cooperated with investigators, but spokesman Mike Healey said Tuesday: "We're not pitting the band against the Derderians."

Promoter Tim Clark, who said Great White used fireworks without permission at a Feb. 7 concert in Pinellas Park, Fla., said he was interviewed at his Florida home Tuesday by officials from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. He said he has not been subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury.

The nightclub's stage manager and sound engineer says he warned one of the club's owners, Michael Derderian, months ago that bands were using pyrotechnics inside the structure and that the practice should be stopped.

The manager, Paul Vanner of East Providence, told the Boston Herald and The Boston Globe he didn't see any bands use pyrotechnics again until last week, when sparklers ignited during Great White's first song, setting off the fire.

Legal experts and fire investigators said the Derderians or members of the band Great White or both could be indicted on such charges as involuntary manslaughter or second-degree murder.

"It is pretty obvious that there was some joint responsibility. Maybe the issue is not which one to charge, but what to charge both with," said Donald Bliss, state fire marshal for New Hampshire and the president of the National Association of State Fire Marshals.

Edward Ryan Jr., an attorney who represented a homeless man charged with manslaughter in a 1999 fire that killed six Massachusetts firefighters, compared the Rhode Island case to Boston's Cocoanut Grove nightclub fire that killed 492 people in 1942.

In that fire, the nightclub owner was charged with negligent manslaughter for having an overcrowded club with locked exit doors, an act that showed he disregarded known risks to life, Ryan said. He said the bar boy suspected of starting the fire when he lit a match was not charged because the deaths were caused by an unsafe building.

SGA to discuss 'slush fund' activity

he said. "I know the money was spent in the best interest of students, but again, we (SGA members) need to hold ourselves accountable to it."

Members of the SGA Senate will also review a motion tonight calling for an official SGA definition of the word "diversity." The motion, which will be presented by Senator Matt Progen, is requesting that the SGA define "diversity" as it will be used within the Senate body.

"I understand why he's bringing this motion before the Senate because of recent questions asked, but I'd rather be spending time on helping the students," Saunders said. "I'm here to facilitate the meetings. Anyone has the right to put anything on the agenda, so therefore I'm all for it."

Concerns regarding the motion have been expressed, specifically regarding the ever-changing definition of diversity.

"I think it's great that the Senate can try to define diversity, but it's ever-changing," Morrison said. "I think diversity is not just race or ethnicity but it's ideology, one's belief system and experiences. It can be contradictory by definition if you ask me," Morrison said.

The SGA Senate meets tonight in room 163 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. All meetings are open to the public.

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and the New England College of Optometry in 1975. I am very proud of the University Health Service Eye Care Services and the high quality of eye care delivered to more than 90,000 individuals over the last 26 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of the New England College of Optometry and co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. In addition, I am credentialed in diagnostic and therapeutic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry.

EYE CARE SERVICES INCLUDE:
- Routine eye examinations
- A new onsite eye glass service
- Emergency eye care
- Full service contact lens care
- Co-management of laser refractive surgery

Our staff takes great pride in being able to fit many people who have had difficulty in the past wearing contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Services over the years has been consistently excellent.

Opening up with Romney: A step in the right direction

Traditionally following a change of power in the governor's office, the inauguration speech replaces the customary State of the State address. Governor Mitt Romney broke with tradition today as he issued his second public televised address to the people of the Commonwealth with his 15 minute State of the State address.

The ideas were many of the same he has expounded upon since he took office. The cornerstone is what would amount to $232 million in cuts to cities and towns, roughly a 5% cut in local aid. Wealthy towns would take a larger hit.

Money would also be saved across the state with the streamlining of numerous programs, Romney claims. Among these consolidations would be a major revamping of 15 health and human service agencies that serve Massachusetts.

With impact right here on campus, Romney plans to implement a common application that could be used for all public higher education institutions in the Bay State. Similar programs have been developed in other parts of the country, including Texas, that nation's second largest state.

Above all else though, Romney continued with his pledge that no taxes were not the answer, claiming that they were a "dead-end street." Romney proclaimed, "Our state government spends tens of billions of dollars each year. Properly channeled, these dollars can be a powerful economic engine. Let's rev up that engine."

It is still too early to pass judgment on the Romney plan to turn our state around. He claims his current adjustments would save the state $2 billion a year, though specifically outlined programs only have cut several hundred million. Let's remember though that he still has been governor for less than two months.

Our state, like many in our nation, is in financial distress. This fact is disputed by none. When money is scarce, the government's wallet gets tighter and tighter. We know all too well here at UMass what can happen when the government reduces funding. However, we can't sit around idly by complaining for more money at the expense of other needy areas of the state.

In tough times, all must take cuts proportionally, in order to be the most fair. Romney declared his goal of keeping homeless programs, child care, and some welfare plans intact. He also seeks to create an Executive Office of Education to oversee Massachusetts' public education initiatives. Such an office, one would hope, would look out for key interests here at UMass.

Governor Romney is far from out of the woods yet. It is still early to determine which of his programs will be successful at stopping the financial hemorrhaging of our proud state. We need to see results to give him the full green light.

Credit should be given though where it is due, and up to this point Romney has been very open in discussing issues with the public. He's even currently working on developing his own weekly call-in show on a talk radio station in Boston to continue discourse with the general populace.

One can only hope such an open door policy continues.

A necessary solution

Gilad Skolnick

Did we all forget about the Kurds? People are quick to rally behind such causes as a free Tibet or more rights for Native American reservations, all very worthwhile causes, but when it comes to the Kurds, people are quick to forget about them. A distinct ethnic people with their own language and culture, the Kurds have inhabited northern Iraq, Eastern Syria, and Eastern Turkey for over 2,500 years.

It was 1988 when Iraqi troops were ordered by none other than Saddam Hussein to kill every Kurdish male between the ages of 18 and 55. Over 100,000 men disappeared and 4000 villages were completely destroyed, but this wasn't enough for Mr. Hussein, and 60 more villages were gassed with chemical weapons and tens of thousands more died. Those who survived the gassings and went ahead to bury their dead relatives, later became ill and died from the deadly chemicals that remained on the people they buried.

To this day the Kurds are suffering from cancers and birth defects connected to the gassings. Numbering over 20 million, the Kurds have no country. Their one hope is that the United States destroys Saddam Hussein's murderous regime, which could lead to independence for the Kurds.

I hate war, but sometimes we don't have a choice. As much as I'd love it if we could all just get along and hug and all hold hands, I know that in reality it's not going to happen. At least I have a hard time with a mass murderer like Saddam Hussein getting away with such heinous crimes. My quarrel is not with the Iraqi people, as our president said, but with their dictatorship regime. If the government of Iraq could wipe out hundreds of thousands of Kurds without blinking an eye, I don't even want to think about what would happen if Saddam Hussein were given a chance to do what he wants.

I've heard all the excuses why we shouldn't attack Iraq. People say that the United States has weapons of mass destruction too, but they forget that the United States is a responsible country that doesn't gas or kill its own people. Another popular argument against a war with Iraq is that it's not the United State's place to be the world's policeman. What's a society without police officers I ask you? It's a society of crime and chaos.

Someone needs to do it, and the United Nations has proven itself time and time again incapable of meeting the task. Any organization that has such countries as Sudan and Syria on the human rights board can't be taken seriously. In Sudan the Muslims in the north enslave thousands of Christians in the south while the government turns a blind eye, while Syria can fill libraries upon libraries on their human rights abuses.

"What's a society without police officers I ask you?"

In addition, antiwar protesters charge that the United States created Saddam Hussein in the first place, and whether or not this is true, it's never too late to try to fix a mistake. Whether or not Bush wants Iraq gone for the right reasons, Saddam Hussein is guilty of countless atrocities against the Kurds of Iraq, against the oppression of his own people and against the environment. Saddam had his troops intentionally release oil into the Persian gulf during the Gulf War, an amount that was 20 times larger than the Exxon Valdez spill in Alaska and twice as large as the previous world record oil spill.

Furthermore Saddam Hussein gives away tens of thousands of dollars to families of suicide bombers every year to encourage more death and terrorism. The fact that he's a ruthless dictator everyone agrees upon. The problem is that most people don't want to do anything about it.

During the Gulf War not one American tank was destroyed by Iraq, and since then the Iraqi army has not been getting any stronger, while ours has. Furthermore, in the age of precise computerized cruise missiles, Iraqi civilian casualties would be minimized.

Chances are that Saddam does have chemical weapons; with a country over double the size of Idaho there are infinite places where he could hide them. It's no secret that cash tight countries such as North Korea are desperate to sell their nuclear weapons to someone, and Saddam is desperate to find a seller. Ignoring this situation would only worsen everything.

We recently saw what happens when you try to negotiate with ruthless dictators. Clinton struck a deal with North Korea to supply oil as long as they didn't develop nuclear weapons, rather than destroy their military capabilities. Well surprise, surprise, North Korea announced that they have nuclear weapons and possibly missiles that can reach some parts of the US.

Angry at the United States for halting his conquest of Kuwait over a decade ago, Iraq's Machiavellian dictator would love to get his revenge and Al Qaeda would be a perfect tool to do so. Someone like Saddam would jump on the opportunity to use terrorism against the United States if given the chance.

The reality is that Iraq under Saddam's rule will always be a threat, a threat to the citizens of Iraq and to the rest of the world. It's time to bomb Iraq and get a step closer to world peace.

Just take it already

Julia Maguire

There is a bizarre novelty in the taking of a group photo, an improbability of gathering a large number of people and having them all look in the same direction. Ultimately, it is a unique snapshot of something that is unlikely to be reproduced. Unfortunately, because that it is the belief, everyone wants their own copy, so 70 cameras are eventually lined up and one person is relegated to the thankless task of capturing a moment whose novelty diminishes within the first three flashes. The only bright spot is that once you stand up straight from the uncomfortable position you've been frozen in for the last 20 minutes, no one will ever ask you to do it again.

However, you would be wrong. Oh so very wrong.

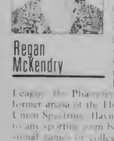
Being in Australia for the first time it is mandatory to take a lot of pictures. Encouraged even. But every lookout point, every panoramic view, every rest stop has opened the opportunity to huddle together for another group photo. Hey, they'll say, "this is a pretty tree, gather around!" or, "let's stand on the edge of the cliff overlooking the ocean" or, "look, why don't we get a shot in front of that brick wall? Where will we ever see anything like this again, and when we're done, we can all bang our heads against it!"

I'm just as guilty of the indulgence of taking photos of everything that seems interesting, but simply at the expense of wasting film. I'm really looking forward to the four shots of the railing I took while trying to get the Tasmanian devil in my frame or the entire roll I have of birds in the trees, that were taken with a really bad zoom lens, which will essentially be pictures of trees. I even have a photograph of the ocean. No island in the background, no sun sinking into the sea, just the water. What am I supposed to do with that?

There are things I wish I had gotten a picture of, like my first taste of kangaroo meat, because that's the only way I'll ever relive it, or the look on my friend's face when she came across a huge dead snake and ran into the road screaming. That's the kind of stuff I want to remember about my trip. I now have taken all the group photos I can stomach, but I know I have more to look forward to. The funny thing is most people only care about ten percent of the participants in the photo and yet they continue to offer up their camera like they've come across some rare find.

One redeeming quality about the group photo is getting the one that no one really paid attention to, where people are looking in opposite directions, or in the middle of a sentence, or a sneeze. It's more interesting to catch the cracks in the quest for such uniformity. This past weekend our group leaders tried to get one last shot at the end of a long day. It will be a remarkable look at people's self-involvement in the face of being forced into a task that has become mind numbingly repetitive. Most people were facing the wrong direction or were fully engaged in conversation. Every few minutes, clusters of people would remember why we were all standing so close together and would smile in the general direction but would become distracted again. Everyone was anxious to be done with it, even those that had volunteered their cameras.

"I now have taken all the group photos I can stomach but I know I have more to look forward to."



It was entirely demonstrative at how quickly people's indecision over the memories they want is quickly growing. Do they want pictures that mean something to the people they show them to back home or pictures that will invoke specific memories for them personally? Should we all be standing around a pool waiting for a shot to show off the fact that people are capable of gathering in a group or should we become more attuned to the fact that they could actually be doing something, here, in Australia that would be a much better story to tell to our friends than the origins of rows of smiling strangers.

I'm not saying we shouldn't be taking as many photos as possible.

It's just a little ironic that we're already trying to remember things we haven't even finished yet, but that's true of any photograph. In the end, these group photos are inevitable and even though the number of cameras lined up dwindles each time, someone still wants a copy and the least we can do is smile.

The Fenway of the future

Regan McKendry

While in Philadelphia on business this weekend my traveling companion decided that I should attend a Phantoms game. The minor league affiliate for the neighboring Flyers of the National Hockey League. The Phantoms play in the former arena of the Flyers, the First Union Spectrum. Having never been to any sporting event besides professional games or college matches, I expected mental attendance, particularly in a metropolis such as large as the city of brotherly love. These people would have better things to do with their time than watch developing hockey players.

I was wrong. I found myself stunned in the middle of the third period when attendance was announced at nearly 10,000. I looked around the arena granted slightly limited due to the blocking out of certain upper level seats, but it was nearly full. People in this large city had turned out in droves to watch the Phantoms and Albany River Rats do battle, two of the worst teams in the American Hockey League.

Witnessing all that support, my mind began to drift to an idea proposed for the Red Sox a while back, about bringing a minor league affiliate into the city. (Of course being a Boston sports fan and it being mid-February, my mind was on baseball).

When the Red Sox were seriously considering moving out of beloved 91-year-old Fenway Park, one of the many plans tossed about was to keep the park in use. The Red Sox would move to their new facility while the landmark of Fenway would become the new home for a minor league affiliate, most likely the Trenton Thunder. The park would stay in existence and be a showcase for new up and coming baseball talent.

Philadelphians are equally passionate about their four major sports, with basketball perhaps getting a slight edge. With all due respect to Patriots, Celtics, and Bruins fans, the Sox own Boston year round. Even in late January, all that is on most sports fans' minds is spring training down in Fort Myers. If a minor league team in a non-major sport can draw so well, imagine what a baseball farm team could do in one of the top four baseball markets in the country.

"Even in late January, all that is on most sports fans' minds is spring training down in Fort Myers."

The fact that the Phantoms are a farm team for the Flyers helps as well. If the minor leaguers that people in Boston were getting to watch, were a majority of the Red Sox future potential talent, it would give that much more incentive for the fans to fill the seats.

The Red Sox already have the highest average ticket price in baseball and it only keeps going up. Now, part of this is due to the limited capacity of Fenway, but a big portion of the responsibility for the expensiveness of a Red Sox game is being in the city of Boston and trying to compete under baseball's current salary structure, especially in the same division as the New York Yankees. Surely a new park might help lower some ticket prices, but a night out at the ballpark would still be an expensive adventure for the average family of four.

With a minor league affiliate in town, games at Fenway would be more affordable. It would still not be the cheapest thing in the world, but could definitely pass for family entertainment. A large portion of the Phantoms crowd was from the junior set, and many of the give-aways and antics of the evening were geared towards them. While a family might be able to do a Red Sox game once or twice a season, the same group could potentially visit the Thunder (or whomever) a few times a month if they so desired.

Fenway Park is a huge draw in its own right. With all due respect to the Spectrum, it does not hold the same place in hockey lore that the oldest ballpark in America does for baseball. People would go to games just to be in the ballpark, particularly the tourists to Beantown. The longer the park is around, the larger its mystique grows.

I'm as big a Fenway fan as there is around. The lore of the park is too numerous to mention. Say what you will about new facilities, and they are nice, but there is still something magical about a game at that old irregularly shaped field. Yet someday, the Sox will move to a new field, just as the Celtics and Bruins did a decade ago. It is inevitable.

The best that baseball fans in Boston can hope for is the preservation of their beloved Fenway and there is no better way that displaying future Sox talent right in front of the Green Monster. It won't be exactly the same, but I'm sure the thunderous roar of the fans will still make the hair on the backs of necks of every baseball diehard all over Beantown stand on end.

Unflattering look at Grammys

By Matt Langione
Collegian Correspondent

It is exactly halfway through the Grammy awards, and I cannot continue to watch. It is not only that I can't stand to, but also that my television now lies in hopeless shambles, mangled on the floor of my common room. Yes, I ravaged it in a fit of rage, after witnessing the greatest travesty that has yet undermined the ever-waning respectability of television. And it wasn't even one of the new, tasteless and painfully predictable reality TV shows. Nor was it the tactless presentation of Afro-hidden Erika Badu. Nope. It was what directly ensued: Norah Jones' "Don't Know Why" edging out Bruce Springsteen's "The Rising" for the Song of the Year Grammy award.

The Song of the Year Grammy is hypothetically awarded to the artist who has penned the year's most exceptional lyrics and set them to music. So, Norah Jones has done that this year, right? No. Actually, it was a fellow that you may not have heard of named Jesse Harris. Indeed, of the 14 songs on her 2002 album "Come Away With Me," Miss Jones has written only two.

The Song of the Year Grammy award is alternately called the Singer-Songwriter award. Now, doesn't it seem somewhat antithetical that someone who doesn't write and sing their own songs would win this award? Neither Jesse Harris, nor Norah Jones seems to constitute the logical definition of a singer-songwriter. I wish I could ask Bob Dylan what he thinks of the fact that this year's winner did not write her own song. In fact, only two of the five nominees did.

Okay, aside from that apparently small point, I seemed to think that song lyrics were supposed to be like poetry — something of a literary form. For me, great literature, particularly great lyrics, possess the unique ability to awaken emotions that previously lay listless in the vast recesses of the soul. Norah Jones' opening lines and principal chorus, "I waited 'til I saw the sun/ I don't know why I didn't come/ I left you by the house of fun/ I don't know why I didn't come/I don't know why I didn't come" don't exactly ring chimes of freedom deep in my heart. They won't accompany me in my time of loneliness or sorrow, and they won't stave off the bitter pang of defeat. They won't do much of anything, except perhaps offer a brief, nostalgic, yet unfulfilling glimpse to the times of Etta James and great jazz music. And even on that note, Etta James didn't write her own songs, and never would have received laurels for anything but her voice.

When I listen to Springsteen's self-penned tune "The Rising." I hear literature as deep and moving as any in pop culture. Sure, it is a pop song, and not as subtle and graceful as some of the work on his folk albums like "Nebraska," or "The Ghost of Tom Joad." However, his prayerful dirge sung from the perspective of a firefighter lamenting the loss of his brethren remains twice as poignant as anything that Norah Jones and her team of songwriters could ever have envisioned. In an emotional, rush of furious crescendo, Springsteen cries, "Spirits above and behind me/ Faces gone, black eyes burnin' bright/ May their precious blood forever bind me/ Lord as I stand before your fiery light."

I wouldn't have much to complain about if it were a time of musical famine, like the late '80s and mid-'90s, when almost nothing of value was being released (I apologize Guns 'N Roses fans). But today that is not the case. The year 2003 marked the rebirth, reinvigoration and resurgence of rock 'n' roll. Where were The Strokes, The White Stripes and The Hives at the Grammys? Where was Wilco, Ryan Adams, Pete Yorn and Beck, whose newest album includes some of his best work yet? Why were the old favorites like Peter Gabriel, Elvis Costello, and Bruce Springsteen snubbed?

To witness Norah Jones, puppet of the music industry, sweep the Grammy awards did more than just impugn the legitimacy of awards shows, but moreover, it effectively strangled the remaining vestiges of faith that I had in pop music.

Eve of her concert

Hip-hop star is poised to conquer worlds of music, movies, TV and fashion

By Nikolas P. Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Hip-hop diva Eve (nee Eve Jihan Jeffers) is hoping to "blow our minds" when she performs at Mount Holyoke's Chapin Auditorium on March 2 at 8 p.m.

The Philadelphia born 24-year-old is performing in support of her most recent album, "Eve-Olution," her third album that has been certified gold by the Recording Industry Association of America for sales of more than 500,000 copies.

Eve is hoping for a lot of energy at the concert.

"I like to feed off the audience," she says. "I like to get people involved in it."

Eve was calling from her hotel room in New York last Friday, preparing for music's biggest night of the year, the Grammy Awards.

She was nominated for Best Female Rap Solo Performance for "Satisfaction," off "Eve-Olution."

Although Eve didn't win on Sunday night, she did have the honor of presenting the Best Rock Performance award along with Fred Durst.

She says her third album is aptly named for her ongoing development as an artist and person.

"I felt like I've grown," she says. "I've grown from music to movies to a fashion line. To me it felt like a perfect name. But I'm still learning."

Eve was one of a large group of female rappers that emerged in the late '90s but one of the few that is still riding high on the Billboard charts.

Her 1999 debut, "Let There Be ... Eve: Ruff Ryders' First Lady" saw multiplatinum sales and established Eve as one of the most important rap artists of the time.

Erik G. Parker, music editor for Vibe Magazine, says Eve has catapulted herself to the top by molding her image as a media mogul and a "pop fashionista."

"She's one of the top female rappers — that's for certain," he says. "She's very versatile. She gets it, as people would say."

Her sophomore effort, "Scorpion,"

UMass students form Echo Head

I know something you don't know! Well, yet that is.

You know how negative I usually am about rock? Well, guess what? I found a band that has reinvigorated my thoughts about the genre — and they were right under my nose here at the University of Massachusetts the whole entire time.

To start off with, the band's name is Echo Head, and it is composed of all UMass undergrads. I first heard this incredible band at a party a couple of weeks ago. To put it lightly, they absolutely blew my mind.

The lead vocalist, Cooper Cerulo of Ashland is a sophomore voice major (and a member of the Doo-Wop Shop), and has been singing since he was 9-years-old; guitarist and background vocalist Dave Schottland of Philadelphia, Penn., is a senior art history major and has been playing guitar since he was 15. Bassist Jesse Richards of Falmouth is a junior electrical engineer major and has been playing bass since he was 13. Saxophonist Josh Clark of Norfolk is a sophomore and is in the School of Management and a jazz performance major and has been playing the sax since he was 10. Drummer, Chris Cocuzzo of Needham, a sophomore computer science major has been drumming since he was 15. You put these five guys together and they have better chemistry than most bands that are seen on MTV 5,459 times a day.

I had the privilege of hanging out with Echo Head last week after one of its practices. The five of them casually sat on a couch in Schottland's bedroom, right next to where all of their equipment was set up. The guys were really excited to be interviewed (they couldn't stop smiling). "Can you write that I like egg salad and that I love my girlfriend?" Schottland eagerly asked. Sure Dave, why not.

As I sat back and asked them some questions, not only was I thoroughly entertained by the group's dynamic, but I also noticed how well the guys clicked as friends. Clark and Cocuzzo were the first of the group to meet, while performing separately in different bands at the WRCN Battle of the Bands three years ago. The rest of the band all met two years ago, became friends and decided to form a band last September.

So now, you're probably wondering what Echo Head sounds like.

Let me tell you. Or rather, let Schottland tell you.

"We sound like not-another jam band," he said as he sat on the couch and played with his guitar.

Right now, Echo Head is mainly doing covers of mid-'90s rock groups including Sublime, Weezer, Stone Temple Pilots, the Wallflowers, the Black Crows, etc. However, the group is in the process of writing their own music. Cerulo further described the group's music as a mix of classic rock, mid-'90s rock, jazz, ska, and funk.

"We try to work on music that people will appreciate," he said.

Now, let me tell you something. When I heard Echo Head do covers of amazing songs such as Sublime's "Wrong Way" and Weezer's "Say it Ain't So," I was blown away. They did such a good job of perfecting the song — I even want to say that they did a better job than the original.

What separates Echo Head from the rest of the aspiring bands out there is that among the vocals, guitar, bass, and

Catty female hilarity returns to MTV; this time the boys join too

Lizzy Nielsen

Four long months have passed since Jordan and Mara made their emotional exits from the pledge class of MTV's first season of "Sorority Life" at the University of California, Davis. One hundred and twenty days have elapsed since we've last encountered the mindless and moronic antics that are Candace, Dede, Jessica and Amanda. Sit tight, the wait is over, for tonight is the premiere of not only another round of sorority stereotype enforcement, but a peek into the depth that is the world of keg throwing and gold-fish eating of frat boys.

Despite rumors that MTV would bring their cameras to UMass, "Sorority Life" and "Fraternity Life" were documented in Buffalo, N.Y. last semester at the University at Buffalo. Delta Xi Omega and Sigma Chi Omega are the respective sorority and fraternity.

It's going to be difficult for MTV to top the moments of last season's "Sorority Life." From the profoundly deep conversations that took place between Candace and Amanda about how Amanda was "sacrificing too much of herself to other people," to the night Candace started downing screwdrivers when she was suppose to be sober sister and drive everyone else home, to the priceless Jessica slap. That slap never seems to get old, as each time I hear Jessica's hysterical outbursts about Sylvia slapping her in the face, it just seems to get better. Here are the best moments from season one of "Sorority Life" in celebration of the start of season two and the inaugural episode of "Fraternity Life." May it be another season of reinforced stereotypes and idiotic hilarity.

JORDAN VS. AMANDA

Jordan and Amanda came into the pledging process as roommates and best friends. However, this did not last, because, as the pledging process continued, Amanda became a growth off of the empty-headed Candace, which irked hair-spray-queen Jordan. Drama ensued, and according to the "Sorority Life" reunion, Jordan and Amanda still do not speak.

CANDACE'S INDISCRETIONS

Candace is the stereotypical sorority bimbo. Dumb, skanky and constantly drunk. She's the reason that sorority girls earn nicknames such as "sorosta-ho," and "sorostitute." Nothing is a better example of this than the evening that Candace and her third arm, Amanda, went out for a wild night at the bars, and Candace ended up swapping spit with the boy that Amanda was apparently in love with. This all took place while Amanda was close enough to still smell Candace's designer imposter perfume. Just when the episode seemed like it couldn't get any funnier, Candace attempted to justify her actions by making the deep and riveting statement, "Amanda, when I get drunk, I kiss guys." Wow, now if that isn't justification for kissing one of your closest friend's love interests, I don't know what is. Keep it up, Candace, you'll have so many friends that way. And probably tons of mouth sores.

JESSICA

Jessica was the girl on the show most grating on the nerves. She was whiny and always had some kind of answer for everything, and usually her answers were wrong. Her nickname, "Cockblock," was one of the funniest aspects of the relationships between all the girls. Jessica had a rep for informing girls at bars that they were sluts for talking to men. The "Slap heard round UC Davis," was one of the most priceless aspects of the show. More power to Sylvia, as if someone talked like that to me at a bar, I'd punch him or her in the face. Stop acting all jealous, Jessica. Someday someone will want to kiss you, too.

PAULINE VS. THE PLEDGES

Pauline was great. If the Devil took up ice hockey, Eminem proclaimed he's homosexual and I joined a sorority, I'd definitely be Pauline. She saw through all of the dumb antics

Common takes bold step on 'Electric Circus'

By Justin Chellman

Hip-hop is changing. Over the past few years, subtle changes have been taking place and popping up above the underground – all the way to "Rap City" and "TRL." Outkast has been experimenting with funk and rock on their last two albums. The Roots have added a guitarist to their ranks of musicians, and both Mos Def and Q-Tip are fronting funk/rock bands.

Now Common has taken a bold step with "Electric Circus," where he almost completely steps away from his usually innovative but true school formula. His critically acclaimed last venture, "Like Water for Chocolate," drew fire from many of his long time hip-hop fans because of its departure from the sound of his past classics "Resurrection" and "One Day It'll All Make Sense." Fans felt the album was too soft and experimental and yearned for the more intelligent boom mixed with soul that Common was known for.

On "Electric Circus," Common takes us on a psychedelic trip through his new version of hip-hop expression. Common's theme even carries over to the cover, which is an ode to The Beatles album "Sgt. Peppers Lonely Hearts Club Band." Just as on The Beatles album cover work, Common's cover has him in front of cutouts of many famous (mostly African-American) people.

MSNBC axes Donahue's talk show after six months on the air

By DAVID BAUDER
Associated Press

NEW YORK - MSNBC fired Phil Donahue on Tuesday, abruptly ending the veteran talk show host's return to television after six months of poor ratings.

Donahue's final show will be Friday night. The news show that precedes him on the air, "Countdown: Iraq," temporarily will be expanded to two hours to replace him.

"We're proud of the program and we're disappointed that the show was not able to attract the viewership we had hoped for and expected," said Erik Sorenson, MSNBC president. "We thank Phil and his staff for their dedication, commitment and passion."

Donahue's office referred calls to his agent on Thursday, and he did not immediately return a call for comment.

The move was not a surprise. MSNBC hoped "Donahue" would provide a liberal counterweight to Fox News Channel's competing "The O'Reilly Factor," but the ratings started poorly and didn't improve.

MSNBC tried to tweak the show in November, putting Donahue in front of a live audience in New York instead of in a New Jersey studio, but it made little difference.

The political talk show format has yet to prove — and may never — that it can support a liberal voice, said Andrew Tyndall, head of ADT Research, a television news consulting firm.

Donahue's chances weren't helped by MSNBC's impatience, he said.

"They're very quick to cancel shows," Tyndall said. "Right from the start, they haven't settled on a format and let it grow, so people can find it. If it's not working in a few months, they cancel it and move on to something else."

MSNBC also has sought a younger audience than its cable news rivals and the hiring of Donahue, 67, went against that strategy. "Anyone who's under 25 doesn't remember when his old talk show was on the air," Tyndall said.

During this month, a "sweeps" month in which ratings are watched closely to set advertising rates, "Donahue" averaged 446,000 viewers. O'Reilly drew 2.7 million viewers, up 28 percent from February 2002, according to Nielsen Media Research.

Connie Chung's CNN show that debuted shortly before "Donahue" averaged 985,000 viewers this month, Nielsen said.

"Countdown: Iraq," with Lester Holt as host, is one of the network's few success stories, occasionally inching past CNN to second in the cable news ratings.

Donahue was a nine-time Daytime Emmy winner for his syndicated talk show, which began in 1967 and aired nationally from 1970 to 1996, paving the way for dozens of such shows to follow.

He began his MSNBC show July 15 with a panel discussion on whether the United States should try to oust Saddam Hussein. On Monday night, with Rosie O'Donnell as guest, they talked about the same topic.

The show's failure is "a footnote" to Donahue's career, Tyndall said. "His legacy is unharmed," he said. "He invented an entire genre of television."

Phil Donahue's show on CNN, "Donahue," was cancelled.

Fox continues strong streak behind 'Millionaire'

By DAVID BAUDER
Associated Press

NEW YORK - Fox can well afford to write "Joe Millionaire" a check. His show's finale led the network to its most-watched week ever, except during sports events like the Super Bowl or World Series.

The final hour of "Joe Millionaire" drew a stunning audience of 40 million people last week, according to Nielsen Media Research.

Fox also took advantage of a highly rated "American Idol" episode and special. Its two-hour special giving Michael Jackson's side of his controversial TV interview had 14.1 million viewers (roughly half the — audience of the original interview on ABC but still better than Fox usually does on Thursdays.

More than 20 million people watched the conclusion of "The Bachelorette" on ABC, but two other ABC reality shows — "Are You Hot?" and "I'm a Celebrity, Get Me Out of Here!" — fared less well.

An estimated 24.8 million people saw Norah Jones' big night on the Grammy Awards on CBS Sunday, up sharply from the nearly 19 million people who watched it last year.

Despite Fox's impressive week, CBS was still the most-watched network. In fact, CBS is likely to win the February ratings "sweeps," despite all the attention paid to its rivals' numbers.

Michael Jackson, Tricia and "Joe Millionaire" got all the headlines in February," CBS President Leslie Moonves said. "But CBS gets the win."

For the week: CBS averaged 15.6 million viewers (9.8 rating, 15 share). Fox had 15 million viewers (8.7, 13). NBC 12.3 million (8.1, 13). ABC 10.3 million (6.6, 10). the WB 3.8 million (2.4, 4). UPN 3.5 million (2.3, 3) and Pax TV 1.2 million (0.8, 1).

The finale of "Joe Millionaire" drew a whopping 40 million viewers last week.

ABC's "World News Tonight" captured the evening news ratings race averaging 11.6 million viewers to 11.4 million for NBC's "Nightly News" (both 8.1 ratings, 13 shares) The "CBS Evening News" had 9.7 million viewers (6.8, 12).

A ratings point represents 1,067,000 households or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 106.7 million TV homes. The share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

Big, fat TV ratings for 'Greek Life'

NEW YORK - The TV series adaptation of the hit movie "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" drew robust ratings for its premiere Monday night on CBS.

The renamed "My Big Fat Greek Life" not only won its time slot in a special airing at 9:30 p.m. EST but was the most-watched premiere of a comedy on any network in more than four years, CBS said. It had an audience of 22.7 million viewers.

The 2002 film, which takes a lighthearted look at a Greek-American family's reaction to their daughter's non-Greek suitor, has made box office history by grossing $240 million, and counting. It was filmed for $5 million.

The new series, starring the film's writer and star Nia Vardalos, picks up as the newlyweds return from their honeymoon.

Most of the film's major cast members are back, including Lainie Kazan, Michael Constantine, Louis Mandylor, Andrea Martin and Gia Carides. Steven Eckholdt has replaced the film's John Corbett as the husband.

"My Big Fat Greek Life" now moves to its regular time slot, Sunday at 8 p.m.

"My Big Fat Greek Life," the show based on the hit movie, drew boffo rating with its premiere Monday night.

The last sitcom to premiere as successfully was NBC's "Jesse," which bowed in September 1998.

Common debuts big top album with electrifying 'Circus'

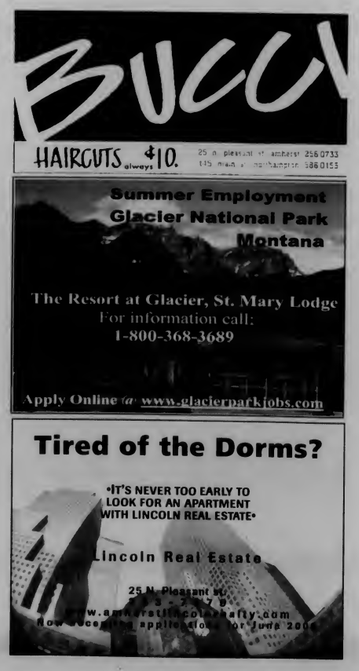
Electric Lady studio, "Electric Circus" is aptly titled because of its strong electric rock feel that is evident from the start of the album. The album is also very much catered to the masses. Not in a jiggy Jay-Z and Nelly kind of way, but in the way the music has a mainstream pop appeal. J Dilla, a.k.a. J Dee, a Slum Village associate, also part of the Soulaquarians and one of the main producers of this album, commented on this subject matter in another interview. J Dilla felt the last album was a great accomplishment, but that the hit song "The Light" had the record executives wanting Common to continue releasing similar material. J Dilla explained that all the other songs he produced on "Like Water for Chocolate" felt good because he was able to work with Common and give him beats that he felt fit well with his style. J Dilla complains that on this venture he was restricted to the confines of the new sound as well as trying to please the record executives. He explains that this also explains why the lead single "Come Close" featuring Mary J. Blige was made. On this track Common talks rather than raps to his fiancée about his love for her.

"Common softy speaks on a few serious subjects, such as a woman's rape and a man's realization of his homosexuality. Common has been criticized in for making scathing comments about gays in the past."

The first true track on the album is titled "Soul Power" and it explains itself; it is Common over a funky keyboard styled beat. The next two tracks bring a very electric and psychedelic feel to the album. "Aquarius" has a head-nodding keyboard sound with a guitar plucking in the background all supported by a heavy electric bass. Common comes fast and tough backed by a chorus that is reminiscent of the 1960s musical "Hair". This goes right into the next track which is the hardest song on the whole album "Electric Wire Hustle Flower" (a weird and maybe corny name), but Common makes it work as he screams at the top of his lungs along with Sonny from P.O.D. The song is rock overdrive with a hard rap from Common that clashes hip-hop and rock in a flashing light electric circus feel, now we begin to understand the album title.

The next track slows it down a bit after the last exclamation mark approach. "The Hustle" feels like being put on a spaceship with P- Funk'in the early 80s, but it's cool. You can't help but sing along to some of the lyrics. We get another cool song with a banging heavy piano beat on the low keys where Common gets rough again on "New Wave." The song switches up all of a sudden as Mary Hansen from Stereolab comes out of nowhere and hits a weird chorus that's new wave 80s style.

Next Prince and Bilal join Common for a smooth song about phone sex, entitled "Star 69 (p.s. with love)" which isn't a standout song on the album but also isn't that bad. The next song may be the first Neptunes beat I'm really not feeling. It could be the beat just doesn't fit Common, because it just doesn't flow right. The song is titled "I Got A Right Ta" and has Common rapping his regular style from the last albums and as always on a Neptunes beat, Pharrell Williams graces us with his voice as he sings the chorus off key and whispers throughout the song.



The next song makes up for the shortcomings of the last two as we are treated to the always welcome presence of Cee lo Greens smooth vocals over a soft keyboard track. Common softy speaks on a few serious subjects, such as a woman's rape and a man's realization of his homosexuality. Common has been criticized in for making scathing comments about gays in the past. Still making homosexuality seem like something unwanted, Common shows some signs of maturity in realizing that his past remarks may have been wrong, even though he doesn't come out right and say so in the song.

The last track's seriousness gives way to a rag time like beat with horns and all on "I am Music" featuring Jill Scott. It's very up-tempo and Common flows over it with a choppy flow that goes very well with the beat, very well-timed. This is definitely one of the best songs on the album because I've never heard another rap song like it at all, and simply, it's really good. Common tries to sing along with Erika Badu on a very long and not very listenable ode to Jimi Hendrix on the next song. It's far too ambient, and at eight minutes it's almost torture to listen to it all the way through. So after skipping that one as I do now we get to the last track of the album, usually reserved for Common's father as he gives insight. This one features his father but also a collaboration with the people that are featured on the album such as Mary J. Blige, Erika Badu, Cee lo, Bilal and Jill Scott. It's a smooth soulful song that has the feel of just a super star soul jam with everybody just belting out sweet harmonies.

It brings an end to an album that leaves you most definitely feeling like you've just returned from a musical journey. You don't know what to call it. Is it mainstream? No I'm not so sure that this is what the mainstream will eat up, it's not "Nellyville," but it does have pop appeal.

You don't have to unwrap it, unroll it, or worry that it can Break.

Eve's TV show and fashion line, Fetish, scheduled for fall earned her a Grammy nomination for Best Rap Album. Although it didn't win, Eve took home a Grammy — her first — for Best Rap/Sung Collaboration for her Dr. Dre-produced duet with No Doubt's Gwen Stefani for "Let Me Blow Ya Mind."

Her three albums have sold more than three million copies. Her current single "Satisfaction" is at number 20 in its 15th week on Billboard's Hot Rap Tracks chart. "Eve-Olution" spawned the hit single "Gangsta Lovin'" featuring Grammy winner Alicia Keys.

The driven songstress credits a strong work ethic for her rise to the top.

"I really focus on myself, not in others. I have to be successful. I'm a workaholic. It's a certain way that I have to live my life."

Spoken like a true Scorpion. And she's quick to point out that her eve-olution isn't going to be over anytime soon.

"It's still early for me," she says. "I have so many things to do. Even musically, I still feel like I have so many things to do. I'm not done yet."

Last year, Eve made her entrance into Hollywood with two movies. She garnered positive reviews in the summer blockbusters "XXX," playing action-star Vin Diesel's best friend and business partner in an underground web site, and the Ice Cube comedy "Barbershop," where Eve was the only female barber in a small South Side Chicago shop. The flicks brought in a combined total of $217 million domestically.

Hopefully I'll be acting more," she says. "It's so much fun. It's just different. It's a different feeling."

Eve says she hopes to balance both music and movies in the future, although she hasn't signed on to do another film yet.

"I've been reading scripts," she says. "I haven't locked down any yet. Hopefully I will be able to balance both. I definitely can't give up on music yet. I love music."

Eve's been known to pack sharp producers and fierce vocal talent on her albums. She says she enjoyed working on her collaborations with Stefani and Keys, pairings that resulted in two of the biggest hits of her career thus far.

"Alicia and Gwen are just two real genuine, down-to-earth people," she says. "They're real cool, they're regular people. It was real fun working with both of them."

She says she would love to reteam with red-hot rap artist, Missy Elliott to record a joint album together. Eve worked with the Supa Dupa Fly artist on "Hot Boyz," off of Missy's 1999 album, "Da Real World."

"We're still trying to get our schedules together," she says. "Hopefully it will happen, because that would be incredible. We haven't come up with any idea or direction yet."

She says her numerous collaborations with other female artists offers her a sense of pride.

"Girl power! That's the only thing I can really say. It's not a conscious thing," she says. "When I do think about collaborations, I really do think about females. Let's get together, and make a great song."

Girl power also seems to be her motto as the First Lads of Ruff Ryders, her rap super group that is dominated by men. Eve, who is a self-described "pit bull in a skirt," has showed that women are just as tough, and just as talented as their male counterparts.

"I think it makes you stronger," she says. "When I first got with them, I went through a series of steps. And it definitely makes you stronger. I have to prove myself. Most guys think females don't write their own rhymes. But if they see her in the studio they say, 'Wow, she can do it on her own.'"

Besides her planned collaboration with Missy Elliott, Eve has several other projects in the pipeline.

The stylish singer, who won the Breakthrough Style Award at the VH1/Vogue Fashion Awards last year, will branch out by crafting her own woman's clothing line, Fetish, which will be distributed by urban modernizers Iceberg Jeans, is set to launch in the fall. She describes the clothing as being similar to other urban designer duds but with a fashion style that's all her.

"I wear so many designer clothes," she says. "I put my own flair with it that other lines don't have."

That role should help her transition into television. Eve will play a "young, outgoing fashion designer" in an as-yet-untitled show, which is scheduled to launch in the fall on UPN. The show's pilot is currently being reworked and casting will begin within the next few weeks, but she declined to reveal any further details.

Eve started her rap career in Philadelphia, easing her way into the rap world and making a name for herself as Eve of Destruction. She was introduced to Dr. Dre while in Philadelphia. Dre gave her the opportunity for an impromptu audition. He was so impressed that he flew her to Los Angeles to make a demo tape.

"I love Dre," she says. "He's the hardest person. He's like a boot camp instructor. It brings the best out of you. When you go into the studio [with Dr. Dre], you know you're there to work."

Eve gained some fame after one of her demo songs, "Eve of Destruction," appeared on the "Bullworth" motion picture soundtrack. She later met up with DMX, who brought her into the Ruff Ryders camp, where she cut her debut in 1999.

As hip-hop approaches its 30th birthday, like many in the rap world, Eve is coming down with a serious case of nostalgia for the genre's early days. Days when the art form was about lyrical skill and good old fun, and the culture's other components — gangs, materialism, drugs, and violence — were shunned.

"The only thing that I would like to change is this constant beef between people," she says. "The battles kinda help hip-hop gain attention. But there's a certain point where it's gotta stop."

She points out that lyrical battles between Tupac Shakur and the Notorious B.I.G. turned deadly last decade, a movement which now stands as the marker for hip-hop's shift from playfulness to extreme materialism.

"All of that stuff started with words and now they're both dead," she says.

Despite concerns for the art form, Eve says she still enjoys hip-hop very much. But says it's difficult to keep herself in check in the very glamorous scene of the entertainment world.

"I honestly think it's hard," she says. "It's hard because if you allow yourself to get caught up it's hard to get back out. Everyone around me is a yes person. They don't try to hype me up. I pray to god, 'Please god, keep me grounded, keep me focused.' You have to struggle to remind yourself that."

One of the ways she stays connected is by giving back to the community. She has established the Love Is Blind Foundation, named after the hit single that addressed domestic violence. The Philadelphia-based organization benefits battered and endangered women and children.

"I think it's important for all entertainers and athletes in the public life that we're not living in our own bubble," she says. "I think especially for kids. A lot of kids look up to us. You never know what kind of an impact that you have on somebody's life."

The nearly sold-out show is the fourth in a special Presidential Concert Series at Mount Holyoke College. Chapin Auditorium is an intimate setting for the multi-platinum artist, with a 1,350 seating capacity, according to John Laprade, director of student programs at Mount Holyoke College.

Eve arrives at the 45th annual Grammy Awards at New York's Madison Square Garden Feb. 23.

exhibited by the pledges, and at one point told them all to (expletive) off. The pledges were note to fond of her either, and definitely bared their bleached teeth and bright red acrylic nails towards her. Especially in the reunion when the clip of the Pauline "f-bomb" was shown, it was apparent that all the pledges wished she didn't exist. More power to you, Pauline. Keep the Greek system real, if that's possible.

MTV has undertaken a huge task of trying to cap the hilarity of last season's "Sorority Life." However, what's better than following around a bunch of brain dead girls? Why not follow around a bunch of imbecile boss from the same school? "Sorority Life" and "Fraternity Life" both premiere tonight on MTV at 10 and 10:30 p.m. This is reality TV at its dirtiest and dumbest, and I wouldn't have it any other way.

drums, there's also a saxophone. "The sax adds a different voice that people aren't used to," Clark said. Cocuzzo also mentioned that "the thing that's the most interesting is how we use the sax for rock covers," even when the originals don't have a sax in it.

So now you're probably wondering what the hell "Echo Head" means. Cocuzzo's band back in Boston, Dropdown, suggested Echo Head for their own band. That obviously didn't work out, so the name was thrown on the table (figuratively and literally, the table at the DCI for the boys here. This was only decided a couple of weeks ago, but I personally think that it was a great decision. "Echo Head reflects what we do, which is 'playing back' and echoing our musical influences," Schottland explained.

The boys get together twice a week at Schottland's house and practice for a few hours. They usually warm up with a jam but lately they have been concentrating on learning new music. All in all, Echo Head just wants to play some music, have lots of fun, and develop a name for themselves in the Pioneer Valley. Something tells me that's going to happen. Very soon.

So where can you see and hear Echo Head? Precious gigs include performing at Alpha Chi Omega, the Van Meter Coffeehouse, and the basement of Mary Lyon. Coming up on Thursday, March 6 at 9:30 p.m., they will be headlining at the Hadley Pub.

These guys are a product of UMass' finest. I recommend seeing them ASAP! This way when you're older and your kids are watching old music videos of Echo Head, you can say that you went to the same college as them, and that they were not only talented musicians, but some of the coolest guys you ever met.

only 12 gates and no flushes.

Smith, who hails from the plains of Michigan, dominated the giant slalom, coming in first in both runs on the icy course.

Lewenberg had a solid day, finishing in third and cementing her first place overall Regional championship. Doughty put in an excellent run, counting as the third qualifying time for the overall champions and winners of the giant slalom race.

For the men, Gibson destroyed the competition by finishing in first in both runs with smooth skiing and excellent lines. The men placed four of their five skiers in the top 16 after the first run, and Chris Pomeroy's first run time was good for 16, as his brother David Pomeroy and Nick Kulkarni came in the top 10 behind Gibson.

The second run was all good for the Minutemen with Jay Robbins having his best run in a number of races, and finished in 16th place. The only reason the men did not win the giant slalom was Boston College's Barry Connolly, who had a superb second run finishing only a few tenths of a second off Gibson's second run. Connolly helped BC to a first place finish in the GS and overall.

In the award ceremony after the race, the UMass ski team garnered more medals then they could count, 10 all together. Coach Igor Vanovac had an ear-to-ear grin when Lewenberg won the combined championship for the women and Gibson did the same for the men.

"[I am] so proud," said Vanovac. "They work so hard in training, it is rewarding to see their accomplishments."

The UMass ski teams will go to Tahoe, Calif. to compete for a United States Collegiate Skiing championship and are looking to add a championship banner.

Rivalry in absentia him, but there's nothing else to talk about, unfortunately – for me and everyone else. You've got to talk with your sticks."

At the moment, Els is shouting with clubs.

He became the first player in 14 years to win the first two PGA Tour events of the season, winning at Kapalua with a record 31 under par.

Els won twice in Australia against strong international fields. He is 100 under par in his five tournaments this year, despite having traveled 38,000 miles (that includes a week's vacation in Bali, and another last week in Hawaii).

Woods against Els in the final at La Costa would be the most compelling battle since:

a.) Woods beat Sergio Garcia and Mickelson at the U.S. Open last year.

b.) Woods beat Mickelson and his superior equipment at Torrey Pines two weeks ago.

c.) Woods beat Mickelson and Duval to win his fourth straight major at the 2001 Masters.

It all comes back to Woods.

Still, as much money as Mickelson won, as hot as Duval was in 1999, a renewed rivalry of Woods vs. Els might have the most substance.

Ming's Boston debut sour for Celtics

Superstar rookie scores nine

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Yao Ming got to meet a diplomat and a famous chef before making his Boston debut. During the game, he mostly saw Tony Battie up close and personal.

"They guarded me very tight, but we won," the 7-foot-6 rookie said

Celtics	95	Monday night after being held to two baskets and three rebounds in Houston's 101-95 overtime victory over the Celtics.

With the Celtics focusing on Yao, Cuttino Mobley scored 31 points with 10 rebounds and Steve Francis scored 33 with nine rebounds and nine assists. Yao had nine points as Houston beat Boston for the fifth consecutive time.

"They were all over Yao and this was a great learning experience for him," Rockets coach Rudy Tomjanovich said. "This was the most concentrated defense I have seen on one guy this season defending Yao."

Mobley hit a 3-pointer to force overtime and another for the game-winner to disappoint a sellout crowd that came to see Yao on Asian-American Night. Francis, who missed the previous game with a sore back, hit two free throws with 20 seconds left in overtime, then added a breakaway dunk for insurance with 8.6 seconds left.

"They were double- and triple-teaming the big fella," Francis said. "As much as we wanted to get him the ball, I think he understood because they had so many arms and legs on him that we didn't really want to force it."

The Celtics banged Yao around and denied him the ball at the low post. But he hit a nice skyhook in the lane with 5:59 left in the fourth to cap an 11-0 run that cut the Celtics' lead to four as the Rockets scored 20 of the last 25 points in regulation.

Antoine Walker had 22 points, 11 rebounds and eight assists, and Eric Williams had 11 points and 11 boards as the Celtics lost to the Rockets for the fifth consecutive time.

Boston led 83-68 with 7:13 left in the fourth, but the Celtics made just two baskets the rest of regulation – both by Pierce. He made it 88-85 with a fadeaway jumper with 2:29 left, but a minute later Francis stole the ball away and fed Mobley for the tying 3.

"No way, being at home, we should blow that type of lead," said Paul Pierce, who scored 22. "We had the lead in the fourth quarter and let it get away."

Both teams missed two chances to win it in regulation.

Houston led 92-91 in overtime when Walker hit a runner over Yao. But Mobley answered with a 3-pointer to give the Rockets the lead for good.

Yao then got the ball in the low post and was immediately fouled by Battie. He sank both free throws.

Battie made a layup to cut the deficit to two, but Francis made two free throws and then broke free for the dunk that clinched it.

Yao met Ming Tsai, the host of the cooking show "East meets West," before the game and received a bagful of cooking supplies from the chef. A representative of the Chinese embassy also met Yao before the game.

Hundreds of Asian-Americans waved Chinese flags and held up signs in Chinese while cheering Yao's every move. That he was held without a shot or a rebound for the first quarter did little to damper their enthusiasm.

He finally grabbed a rebound with 4:37 left in the half. A minute later, he was fouled going to the basket, and the crowd cheered loudly even when he missed his second free throw.

The Celtics returned from a 4-2 road trip, during which they traded Shammond Williams for Mark Blount and Mark Bryant. Blount, who played for Boston the last two years, backed up Battie instead of Vin Baker, who did not play.

The Celtics scored the game's first nine points and led by as many as 12 in the first quarter, 26-14, before the Rockets made it 27-22 after one.

Notes: Francis started after missing the previous game on Saturday with a sore lower back. ... Baker did not play for the second consecutive game since Boston traded for Blount. ... Pierce injured his back when he slipped on the ice over the weekend.

Boston Celtics forward Tony Battie, front, vies for the ball with Houston Rockets center Yao Ming, from China, in the first quarter in Boston, Monday, Feb. 24, 2003.

Looking ahead

Steven Werner and the UMass hockey team are looking forward to a key matchup with Merrimack on Saturday, the final game of the regular season. Werner was named Hockey East Rookie of the Week as a result of his pair of goals last Friday in the first game of a weekend split with Maine.

UMass-Temple in the dark

– for fourth place in the East, which would mean a home playoff game.

The Bonnies have a tough schedule remaining, with George Washington, Temple and Dayton coming up, along with a rematch with the Minutemen – which could be a vital game for playoff seeding purposes.

UMass has gotten hot at the right time, as the motion offense – which doesn't rely on set plays – seems to have sunk in and the Minutemen have won three straight.

"It's a hard offense to play, and hard to teach," said UMass guard Anthony Anderson, whose team looked confused by the motion offense earlier in the year. "I knew we'd get better at it eventually, though."

Anderson's numbers have improved significantly since the offense has been hitting its stride. The Lynn, Mass. native averaged 20 points over the three-game win streak, including 25 in Sunday's 70-55 win over Duquesne.

"Anthony is a very good motion player because he's not only good with the ball, he's good without it," UMass coach Steve Lappas said.

Anderson and freshman Jeff Viggiano were the only two bright spots in the Maroon and White's earlier loss to Temple.

Anderson led UMass with 18 points and seven rebounds in 40 minutes of play. Viggiano chipped in with 16 points, five rebounds and six assists in 36 minutes.

In that contest, the Minutemen held Temple to just 35 percent from the field, but gave up 24 second-chance points and were outrebounded 44-26 on the evening.

Temple, which has won seven of its last nine, comes into tonight's game in a dogfight for a first-round bye. The Owls are just a half game ahead of Rhode Island for the second seed in the East and one full game ahead of the Bonnies. While they are in the driver's seat for the bye, the Owls have a tough road down the stretch, with games against the Bonnies, La Salle and Xavier.

Temple will likely be without the services of freshman power forward Antwayne Robinson, who sprained his ankle Feb. 15 against North Carolina State. Robinson dominated UMass underneath in the first meeting with a game-high 13 rebounds (six offensive) to go with eight points.

Temple and UMass may not be getting the national respect it once did, but tonight's matchup should have major implications for both young teams.

Women's track places sixth; Green vaults to first place

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

For the UMass women's track team, last weekend's A-10 conference championship was a successful trip in a losing effort. The Minutewomen placed sixth overall but qualified several athletes into next weekend's New England Championships.

The competition exhibited an array of teams with much deeper squads, especially in the shorter distance runs. "We realized that we didn't have enough depth for the title," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We don't have enough people to score points in all the events."

Richmond took the championship with 134.50 total team points, with host Rhode Island in second (132.50), and Temple in third (115). The rest of the competition rounded out with Saint Joseph's (81.50), Duquesne (74), UMass (60.50), La Salle (59), Dayton (51), and Fordham (33).

LaFreniere was looking at the competition as an opportunity for some of the point scorers on the team to have a strong performance. "We were looking for some personal bests...a lot of them really stepped up," she said.

Two members that picked up their games were ECAC qualifiers Brandy Green and Christina Huff.

Green took the pole vault competition with an 11-foot-five-and-a-quarter-inch jump and is gunning for the UMass record of 12 feet-three-inches. Green will be jumping the next two weekends, at the New England Championships, and the ECAC Championships.

Huff ran a personal best time in the 55 meter dash with a time of 7.18 seconds. Huff placed fourth in the event. "She did outstanding... she didn't qualify last year, definitely made a big improvement," LaFreniere said.

Freshman Ashley Creel pleased LaFreniere, placing second in the high jump with a five-foot-two-inch leap. Creel will also be competing in the New England championship in the Pentathlon event.

In the distance events UMass fared well, sporting a qualifier in the 500, 1000, and 5000 meter runs. Senior Jennifer Freemas finished in fourth in the 500m at 1:17.53. Katherine Blais, also a senior, finished in fifth in the 1000m with 3:01.58, while in the 5000, Julie McGee came in seventh with 18:00.99.

LaFreniere was not pleased with the performance of the 4x4 team, which could have gained the team some points. "They could have been more excited... they were five seconds slower than expected," said LaFreniere. Even with the extra points, the Maroon and White would have stayed in sixth, but it was the matter of effort, which upset LaFreniere.

The Minutewomen go into next weekend hoping to put some points on the board and continue achieving personal bests. The Northeast Championships will be held at Smith College of Friday. The team practices at the Smith track, making it friendly for the Maroon and White.

LaFreniere was happy with what her talent showed her and hopes the effort will run into next weekend. "I think they did as best as they could...a lot of the teams there were even, there was some good competition."

Woods-Els a rivalry in absentia

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

CARLSBAD, Calif. (AP) – Tiger Woods and Ernie Els are the talk of golf, even though they haven't been within 1,000 miles of each other in almost four months.

Call this a rivalry in absentia.

They are on the same golf course for the first time since the Tour Championship at East Lake, but unless they bump into each other on the practice range or in the lunch room at La Costa, they might not see each other at the Match Play Championship.

By following week in Dubai – if they go – right not be much different. Drive for Bay Hill, and maybe the Masters.

That's the problem with our game," Woods said. "It's very hard to play well all the time. And on top of that, we don't play that many events together. But I think if there's anyone I should come down the stretch with, it would probably be Ernie."

Joining the top two players squaring off in the 36-hole final at La Costa:

Not really likely. Woods said.

The top two seeds have never made it through first 18 holes, and, since the Accenture Match Play Championship began in 1999. In two of the four years, the top 10 seeds were gone by the week end.

That doesn't mean a Woods-Els rivalry will lose any luster.

It helps to have the best two players going head-to-head, particularly in the major championships. But the meat of any rivalry in golf is winning, and both have done that better than anyone else lately.

Els has won 11 times in the last 14 months, including four of five tournaments this year. Woods has eight victories during that stretch and whipped the field at Torrey Pines when he returned from knee surgery.

This is not the first time Els has stepped into the ring.

The Big Easy won his second U.S. Open in 1997 at Congressional, just two months after Woods won the Masters by a record 12 strokes. The next year, Woods rallied from eight strokes behind in the final round and beat Els in a playoff at the Johnnie Walker Classic.

A month later, Els was 15 strokes better than Woods in a 36-hole Sunday at Bay Hill.

Since then, Woods' rivals have walked through a revolving door.

Mark O'Meara. David Duval. Vijay Singh. Phil Mickelson.

What made them rivals was winning majors. O'Meara, Singh winning a lot of PGA Tour events. Mickelson on a little of both. Duval.

Woods rarely went head-to-head with any of them.

Duval is the only player other than Woods to be ranked No. 1 over the last four years, and the only time they got together during the height of their rivalry was in the made for TV "Showdown at Sherwood."

"I was winning more than him, and I had a chance in a few of the majors," Duval said. "It would have helped to win head-to-head wherever it may be, but I don't think that matters until someone does that in a major."

That's where Woods has no rival.

After beating Duval at Sherwood in 1999, Woods won the PGA Championship. It was the start of an amazing run in which he won seven of 11 majors.

The problem you face is that until the pattern changes – or if it changes – of Tiger winning two majors a year, you're going to be looking for a rival," Duval said. "And you're not going to meet up to that standard.

Schmidt confident Rose will be reinstated

CLEARWATER, Fla. (AP) – Mike Schmidt acknowledged Tuesday attending a meeting last November between commissioner Bud Selig and Pete Rose, and speculated the career hits leader could gain reinstatement soon.

"I'm optimistic that things will happen fast enough that you might see Pete at Baltimore opening day this year," Schmidt said on his first day as a special hitting instructor for the Philadelphia Phillies. "I don't want to become the commissioner on this issue, but I'm optimistic.

Last week, however, a high ranking baseball official said Selig doesn't plan to consider Rose's application for reinstatement before opening day.

The Cincinnati Reds' the team Rose played for from 1963 to 1978 and later managed, open their new ballpark on March 31 and Cincinnati Mayor Charlie Luken wrote to Selig in November, urging that Rose be reinstated by the first game in the Great American Ball Park.

Schmidt, a Hall of Famer and a teammate of Rose on the Phillies' 1980 World Series championship team, attended the Nov. 25 meeting in Milwaukee that also included Rose manager Warren Greene, Selig and Bob DuPuy, baseball's chief operating officer.

"I'm not going to report on the exact things that were said, but Pete did meet with the commissioner and hopefully in a period of time Pete will be reinstated," Schmidt said. "I think that particular day opened the eyes of people to allow Pete an opportunity to return to baseball."

Rose agreed to a lifetime ban in August 1989 after an investigation of his gambling. Baseball investigator John Dowd detailed 412 baseball wagers in 1987, including 52 on Cincinnati to win, but Rose has repeatedly denied he bet on baseball.

Baseball officials have said Rose must admit he bet on baseball if he is ever to gain reinstatement. As long as he is banned, he is ineligible for the Hall of Fame ballot.

During the 2002 World Series, Hall of Famers Joe Morgan and Johnny Bench, teammates with Rose on the Reds' 1975 and 1976 championship teams, approached Selig about reinstating Rose.

"Joe and Johnny put the bug in the commissioner's ear that if [Selig] would give the forum, Pete might do the right thing, whatever the right thing is," Schmidt said. "Johnny Bench has recently been supportive of Pete. Of course, Joe always has been. I've been in Pete's corner. Pete wanted me to be there [at the November meeting]."

Since the meeting, the momentum to Rose's possible reinstatement has stalled following the revelation that the Internal Revenue Service placed a lien on a home Rose owns in the Los Angeles area, claiming $131,689 in unpaid federal taxes from 1998. Baseball officials also were surprised by reports Rose was seen last month at the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas and the sports book at Caesars Palace.

Schmidt thinks Rose will stay out of further trouble if his ban from baseball is lifted.

"He won't have the free time to travel around," Schmidt said. "He won't be doing card shows. He'll be back doing what he has a passion to do and what he does best – and that's be involved in baseball in some way."

Schmidt talks with Rose on the phone every few weeks, and said Rose most wants to work in baseball, not get into the Hall of Fame.

"Pete knows he's got a Hall of Fame career, but becoming a Hall of Famer is not the No. 1 priority of Pete Rose," Schmidt said. "He really wants to be a manager."

Schmidt promised to keep fighting for Rose until the ban is lifted.

"The way this whole thing is choreographed really has been a nightmare," Schmidt said. "Trying to do it when the timing is right; meeting with Hall of Famers, don't meet with the Hall of Famers; speculation about some of the things that Pete has been seen doing or involved in; IRS issues. In my mind, that's making it take three or four months longer than we all thought I would."

Schmidt is confident that Rose will be back in baseball very soon, though.

"I know, based on the conversations that we had, the commissioner is very much interested in allowing Pete Rose to return to baseball," he said.

Blackout rules apply

No television broadcast for next chapter of rivalry

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Tonight's game at the Unicorns Center will not be televised.

It's the first time in 20 regular season games, a meeting between the Massachusetts men's basketball team (11-14, 5-7 Atlantic 10) and Temple (10-13, 3-4 A-10) will not be on TV anywhere.

What was once considered one of the biggest college basketball rivalries in the country, one that was guaranteed to have big name announcers like Dick Vitale and a spot on broadcast television, has gotten virtually no attention this year.

This year, the first meeting on Feb. 8, which Temple won 61-50 at the Mullins Center, was scheduled to appear on ESPN. But technical difficulties kept the "Worldwide Leader in Sports" from airing all but the final few minutes of the contest.

So a rivalry each school could once count on for 80 minutes of national coverage along with attention from SportsCenter will garner all of two or three minutes for the entire season.

Whether the recent trend speaks of the downfall of the programs from the national scene or simply of the specific rivalry is up for debate, but either way, the lack of coverage hurts the programs.

Interesting, however, that tonight's matchup is so important for both teams, as they look ahead to the A-10 Tournament coming up in less than two weeks.

The Minutemen are trying desperately to improve their playoff seeding, which would improve their chances of success in the tournament. The first round of the A-10s are played on campus sites, as the third- and fourth-ranked teams in each division host games, while the top two teams in each division receive byes to Dayton, Ohio, where the remainder of the tourney will take place.

Currently in fifth place in the East Division, UMass would play at George Washington if the season ended yesterday. But the Maroon and White sits just one game behind St. Bonaventure – which it beat in Olean, N.Y. earlier this month

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Michael Lasme (right) and the Minutemen will take on Temple tonight in a non-televised game at the Mullins Center. It will be the first time in nearly 10 years that the game will not be featured on television.

The UMass Ski Teams had impressive performances this weekend, led by the women's squad which grabbed first place in the Eastern Regional Championships at Waterville Valley.

Medal mania for ski teams

By Ari Jankelowitz
Collegian Staff

The Eastern Regional Championships match up the best of the MacConnie, McBrien and Thompson conferences. Apparently the McBrien and the Thompson conference forgot the memo about sending their best.

The MacConnie Conference is sending nine teams to Nationals. It is truly an amazing testament to the high level of competition in the MacConnie conference, and the Massachusetts ski team was the highlight of the championship.

Coming off a 17th place finish in the NCAA regionals, Carolyn Lewenberg came out skiing with a vengeance. Aggressive skiing and the ability to risk more than most on a cloudy day at Waterville Valley, Lewenberg won the slalom race convincingly by almost two seconds.

The race was impeded by the conditions of the snow, as rain and warm temperatures made the snow loose and hard to ski. This resulted in some very cautious skiing as each team could only race five skiers and three times would be needed to qualify for the team's times to count.

Lewenberg's first run came in at 45.11, almost one second ahead of Plymouth State's Whitney Swaffield and Boston College's Tori Williams. Nikki Smith and Caitlin Doughty both had two outstanding first runs to put the women in first before the second heat followed by Brown and BC.

After the women's outstanding first run, the men followed with a solid placing at fourth. With the Colby-Sawyer men having a field day, led by Matt Ferguson and Coco Felton, the Minutemen looked like they would have some troubles with the days field. Beau Gibson had his usual great run, coming in at third before the next run kept the Minutemen in contention for medal placing.

The second set of slalom racing began to pose a question for the skiers when they came out of the lodge and saw the fog creeping down the mountain.

The fog, however, did not have any effect on Lewenberg as she shut the door on the competition by coming in with a run of 44.35, which put her ahead of the competition for good by 1.7 seconds.

UMass placed three in the top 12, with Smith surviving a gate to the face and a puffy lip, finishing in 9th place with a time of 1:33.79. Doughty did not finish the second trip, but captain Molly Lyon had a great run to place at 12th for the day with a time of 1:34.71.

By the time the last of almost 75 women skiers had finished, a dense fog descended, reducing visibility to a little over 50 feet. To a non-skier, it seemed ludicrous to go down a mountain with such a visual impairments, but because the slalom's setup allows the skier to concentrate solely on the gates at hand, the race went on.

Although Beau Gibson could not catch superfast individual skier Jacob Colognesi from Brown, he did put UMass within striking distance of Plymouth State, which stood at third place.

And just as it looked like the men would finish in fourth and not have the comfort of a medal finish, David Pomeroy put together a great run to nip Plymouth State by less than a second. And when it was all said and done, the UMass men emerged from the fog-covered slope with a third place finish in the slalom event.

When it came time for the giant slalom event, the weather once again provided an obstacle for the men and women skiers at the NCAA regionals. Gusts winds prevented skiers from using the chairlift and caused the race to be started from the closer slalom starting point. This turned the giant slalom into a super-fast slalom race, with

Fox past adversity, happy in new Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) – After all the setbacks Chad Fox endured, he's thrilled to be an important part of the Red Sox bullpen.

He spent five years with Milwaukee, a team with few fans and little success. He had three major operations, missed the 2000 season and ended three of the last four years on the disabled list.

And, in 1995, his only sibling – "my best friend" – died of cancer at age 28.

Chris Fox was two months from getting his master's degree in architecture from Columbia when he was diagnosed. The disease had spread through much of his body, but he was strong enough to go from Houston, where the family lives, to New York to receive it and be recognized as the second highest ranking student in his class, Fox said.

Chris died on July 27, 1995, about three months after the diagnosis.

"He was my biggest fan," Fox said. "When I got called up that was probably the hardest thing. You call your mom and dad, you call your wife.

"Him not being there to call him and say, 'Hey, you know what, we're going up,' because I know he would have loved being there, but in a sense he was."

Fox, 31, was four years younger than his brother and reached the majors July 12, 1997 with Atlanta. He was traded to Milwaukee after the season and had a 3.95 ERA in 49 relief appearances in 1998.

But on July 27, 1999 he had reconstructive surgery on his right elbow for the second time. In 2000, he broke his right elbow in spring training and had another operation. And last season, elbow and shoulder problems limited him to three games.

In 2001, though, he was 5-2 with a 1.89 ERA in 65 games, all in relief, with the Brewers. He struck out 80 and walked 36 in 66 2-3 innings with a fastball in the mid to high 90s and a slider.

Last Dec. 24, the Red Sox signed him as a free agent.

"I got some playoff experience in Atlanta," he said. "I went from the penthouse to the outhouse and now back to the penthouse. Words can't describe the excitement I have."

General Manager Theo Epstein is excited, too.

"He's got great stuff and a good track record," Epstein said. "When he got hurt the last time he was on the verge of becoming one of the more dominant setup guys in the game."

So far Fox feels terrific.

"He threw a slider that's just about unhittable. His fastball had a lot of life to it" last Monday, pitching coach Tony Cloninger said. "A guy like this stays healthy, who knows what he can do?"

"I don't feel any twinge, any pain," Fox said. "I did a lot of hard work. I came out here early to prove to the Red Sox organization that, hey, you guys are taking a chance on me. I'm going to do everything I can to be healthy."

He loves the relaxed atmosphere with the Red Sox after the stressful Brewers clubhouse where players and coaches worried about their jobs.

He felt Milwaukee was pushing him to pitch or have surgery last season when he wanted to rest his shoulder.

"I don't want to sound like I'm bashing Milwaukee. They've got a great trainer over there, but his hands are tied to an extent," Fox said. "I'm glad to be out of there."

Several teams were interested, but the Red Sox offered a one-year, major-league deal and he knew the team's reputation for taking care of pitchers' health.

Because he played only one full season for one of the worst teams, Fox admits he's not well known.

"All I care about is doing my job and helping this team win," he said. "If I can do that and stay the secret weapon, that's fine." It was a "no-brainer" to sign with Boston, Fox said. "It took me about two seconds to say, 'yeah, give me the pen and paper.' "

His brother would have been proud that he was with a contender with a rich tradition. But Fox said there still are times when he cries.

He left his minor-league team when his brother's condition was diagnosed and said he spent every day with Chris for the last 2 1/2 months.

"That's one thing they can't take away from me," Fox said. "I at least got to spend some time, as fast as it went."

His brother's illness made him realize that there are more important things than baseball. And the way Chris handled his cancer without complaint showed Fox he can persevere through his own setbacks.

"He knew he was going to beat this thing and that's the attitude I take," Fox said. "I can go out in front of 60,000 people and let them tell me I'm terrible, but there's something a lot deeper inside of me that's driving me to keep going."

So if Fenway Park fans boo, he can shake it off and head home to his wife and three daughters, aged 6, 4 and 4 months.

"I still want to play bad. I want to win," Fox said. "But I know whatever the results at the end of the day I can walk through those doors and still, I'm daddy. And that's the most important thing to me."

Programming funds moved

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

Chair of Finance Committee Patrick Higgins discusses with the SGA body whether or not to reallocate the Programming Board's funds to the Ways and Means Committee last night. Bryan Thompson, chair of Ways and Means, (left) stands in the background.

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) passed a motion last night placing the $40,000 in Programming Board funds into the SGA's long-term reserve accounts, calming rumors of a Programming Board "slush" fund.

JAMES SCHAFFER/COLLEGIAN

SGA President David Carr

Members of the SGA questioned the Executive Cabinet as to who held responsibility for the Programming Board's $40,000 account, as well as to the inability of the SGA charter to define the necessary quorum to make financial allocations.

Issues further arose surrounding the Programming Board's history of a lack of participation, which resulted from prior financial allocation issues under the Presidencies of Jeff Howe and John Sheehan.

"This is not the first time this has been a problem, and it's obviously a problem that needs to be looked at," Chair of Ways and Means Brian Thompson said.

The Programming Board's history of a lack of participation was brought up. In previous years, financial allocations through the Programming Board during the presidencies of Jeff Howe and John Sheehan were also questioned.

Several members said before the meeting that allegations claiming the Programming Board's funds had been turned over to President David Carr were false.

"We never had a meeting," said Justin Provincher, secretary of the registry and a Programming Board member. "Back in the fall we decided to put on two welcome back events, which were dances held in Southwest and Orchard Hill. Both were planned through programming with the SGA and help from the area governments."

Carr responded to the rumors during the meeting, saying that if the Senate saw a flaw in what programming had done, it was their job to make changes.

"For me it's really a non-issue. All we did was put on two events, each pulling in roughly 3,000 students apiece, as well as put on a Rape Prevention Program that benefited 80 women," Carr said. "If people want to tell me that money wasn't spent well, I dare them to because all we've done is put on beneficial programming that benefited students."

Several members responded to Carr, saying that the concerns were not over the events planned, but the number of individuals used to decide on where the funds were spent.

"I'm not an authority on the Programming Board or in the SGA, but $40,000 is a lot of money and no one did anything wrong with it. The events planned were phenomenal," Orchard Hill Area Governor Mark Morrison said.

Elimination of Bulger proposed

By Dan Lamothe
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts State Governor Mitt Romney called for a complete realignment of the state's higher education system yesterday, including the elimination of University of Massachusetts President William Bulger's office.

According to the Associated Press, Romney said that the state's current higher education system was a "hodgepodge" based more on politics than good planning. His proposal would separate the flagship University of Massachusetts-Amherst from the rest of the university system, as well as privatize the UMass Medical School in Worcester and three other schools. Six campuses in central and western Massachusetts would also be merged.

Under the proposal, the 59,000 student, five-campus University system would be eliminated, taking Bulger's office with it. Seven regional systems would be implemented, with a tighter relationship between the nine state colleges and 15 community colleges in the Commonwealth.

The AP reported that Romney said proposed tuition increases of up to 15 percent and another $100 million in cuts through improved efficiency would help save the state $150 million.

Romney said the elimination of Bulger's office would save the state $14 million. UMass payroll shows Bulger's salary at $349,000 a year.

He was also quick to say that his decision was based on policy, not politics.

"I want to note that the closing of the office was not a political calculation, nor a personal one," Romney told the AP yesterday. "The same decision would have been reached regardless of the occupant [of the office]."

Bulger spokesman John Hoey said that the President's office in Boston sees problems with the proposal.

"This plan would in our view dismantle the University," he said.

Hoey said that until any changes pass through legislation, Bulger will continue to do his job in the same way that he has.

"President Bulger has been serving the Commonwealth for 40 years now," Hoey said. "He's seen a lot of good times and he's seen a lot of crises. He recognizes that this is going to be a long process."

The President's office has already begun to promote the University as it is, Hoey said that in the past few days, the office began preparing a release detailing improvements the University system has made since 1995, when the five-campus system was created. Hoey said that Bulger will do everything he can to promote retaining the system as it is.

"He believes the University should be judged on its merits," Hoey said.

Grace K. Fey, chair of the University Board of Trustees, has also released a statement. In it, she said that the University system has accomplished much as it is and

JIMENA founder to share experiences

By Ikaika Arnado
Collegian Correspondent

Malaka Buhlil, co-founder of the Jews Indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa (JIMENA), will speak today at 7 p.m. in Campus Center Room 163C on the history of her people in the Middle East and North Africa.

JIMENA claims that numerous Arab governments in the 1940's forced Jews to leave their countries. It also claims that Hajj-Amin el-Hussayni, the Arab leader at the time, conspired with Adolph Hitler to annihilate the Jews in the Middle East and North Africa.

Buhlil grew up in Libya. When the Six Day War broke out between Egypt and Israel in 1967, Buhlil experienced the anti-Jewish riots that resulted. During the riots, a British engineer from her company, who was a Christian, hid her. The Libyan government expelled her family and all other Jews from their property, and seized their bank accounts.

While Buhlil and her family fled the country, the bus driver pulled the bus over in the middle of the desert, faking mechanical problems. Buhlil became suspicious and went to a gas station to call for help. When she returned to the bus, the driver had poured gasoline under the bus and was ready to ignite it with a book of matches to burn Buhlil's family. However, Buhlil and her family managed to escape.

Buhlil later moved to San Francisco. Soon after she arrived she volunteered at the Bay Area Council on Soviet Jewry (BACSJ), where she became part of protest demonstrations. In 1970, she became the executive director and held that post for 12 years.

BACSJ assisted in aiding Soviet prisoners by smuggling food into the prisons and demanding better treatment of the inmates. Buhlil went to Russia to work with the underground network that disclosed secret information on prisoners and slave labor camps.

In 1982, Buhlil resigned her position to raise her sons.

Buhlil has dedicated her life to educating people about peace and unity. She was awarded the Martian Luther King Jr. Humanitarian Award for her work.

The event is sponsored by the Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI) and the David Project, and is co-sponsored by the UMass Judaic and Near Eastern Studies Department and the Sephardic Student Association.

Investigation into nightclub fire begins

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) – A grand jury opened an investigation Wednesday into the nightclub inferno that killed 97 people, and members of the heavy metal group whose pyrotechnics are suspected of starting the fire could testify as early as Thursday.

At least two members of the band Great White were seen entering the National Guard training center in East Greenwich where the grand jury met behind closed doors.

However, no one testified and most of the session was devoted to preliminary talks between prosecutors and lawyers for the band, according to two sources close to the case who spoke on condition of anonymity. The sources said the musicians were expected to be back before the panel as soon as Thursday.

Neil Philbin, a lawyer for lead singer Jack Russell, declined comment.

In nearby Pawtucket, more than 200 grief-stricken friends and relatives said goodbye to victim Dennis Smith, 36, who had gone to the concert at The Station because a friend had an extra ticket.

"May the lives of people like Dennis draw us closer together," said the Rev. John Kiley, the only speaker at the brief service. In West Warwick, about 500 people attended a private Mass for another victim of the blaze, 38-year-old Carlos Pimental.

Flames swept through the West Warwick club last Thursday after the band set off a pyrotechnic display during its first song. The band has said it received approval to use special effects, but the two brothers who own the club have denied giving permission.

Legal experts and fire investigators said Jeffrey and Michael Derderian, along with band members, could be indicted on such state charges as involuntary manslaughter or second-degree murder. Federal charges haven't been ruled out.

Edward C. Roy Jr., former president of the Rhode Island Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said he would advise

Union Billiards re-opens with new look

By Ferron Salniker

Union Billiards, the new game room on campus, had its grand opening yesterday, sporting a fresh look and a collection of new games. Over 50 students enjoyed the new facilities in its first hours of operation to the public.

"It's different," said Paul MacGregor, manager of Union Billiards. "We have added a lot of things and everything is new. Before they had 11 pool tables and two ping-pong tables, no music and no TVs. We tried to change all that completely. We want kids to come here and have fun."

The former game room reopened with a number of new features aimed to please students. The new facilities range from the game room's main attraction, pool, to arcade games and foosball. The hangout spot now also holds an air hockey table and darts, as well as a jukebox. The game room is located across from the Hatch in the Student Union.

Union Billiards managers said that the goal of renovating the game room was to provide a new place, different from the previous game room, for students to relax and enjoy themselves.

The former game room was closed two years ago when asbestos was found in the UStore. In order to keep the UStore running while renovations were made, an alternative location was needed to provide a temporary space for the merchandise in the store. The game room was chosen as that temporary location for the UStore, in part because students showed little interest in it. When the renovations were completed on the UStore and it opened once again, people began brainstorming for a use of the space once occupied by the game room. Among the ideas considered were a CD shop or a travel agency.

Students who visited Union Billiards left content with the decision to occupy the space with a new game room.

"Everyone who has come in says it looks so much better than the old game room. It's been packed all day long," said employee Adam Silun, a senior. "It's good that UMass put money into something like this."

Operators were pleased with the attention the game room received yesterday and were also confident that Union Billiards would soon be very popular among the UMass student body.

"Students have come in to look around, just checking the place out," said MacGregor. "Hopefully they'll come back later when they have time. We expect it to take time for people

Program to address situation with Iraq

The Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies will host its fourth "Countdown to War" status report on the situation in Iraq tonight at 7 p.m. in room 227 of Hertel Hall.

The speakers will focus on three main topics: recent diplomatic events and the course a war with Iraq would likely follow, what the economic costs of a war would be and the kinds of political organizing going on in the United States and at the University of Massachusetts.

Speakers will include PAWSS program director Michael Klare, Ann Ferguson of the University's philosophy department and Gerald Epstein of the political economy research institute.

Anita Dancs, research director of the National Priorities Project, will also speak. Dancs is a national authority on the costs of war and prices in Iraqi invasion at almost $100 billion.

"Anita Dancs will be speaking about the economic impacts," said professor Epstein. "Possibly the macroeconomic aspects. Macroeconomics is the study of the economy as a whole."

The speakers will also talk about the possibility of a draft. Ferguson will speak about organizing against the war here in the valley.

The United Nations is being urged by the Bush administration to draft a resolution allowing America to attack Iraq in an effort to oust its leader, Saddam Hussein.

"The safety of the American people depends on ending this direct and growing threat," President George W. Bush said last night, according to the New York Times. "Acting against the danger will also contribute greatly to the long-term safety and stability of our world."

The event will also include talks on terrorism in general, as Afghan President Hamid Karzai admitted yesterday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that terrorists were moving back and forth between the Afghan and Pakistani border.

"This is just a small event, but the whole series of meetings, of which this is one, that the PAWSS has been organizing at many of the five colleges adds up to a substantial event," Epstein said.

Iraq begins preparing for war

By Niko Price
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – Armed with machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades, police deployed around key western Baghdad installations Wednesday in their first major drill of wartime defense. Saddam Hussein ordered every Iraqi to dig a trench for protection during war.

Meanwhile, in a television interview with CBS anchor Dan Rather, Saddam said the country is hoping the United States does not attack, but is bracing for war and said "we are not going to succumb."

Two French Mirage reconnaissance planes flew over Iraq in support of U.N. weapons inspections for the first time. Iraq's Foreign Ministry said. Three American U-2 spy planes – which fly at higher altitudes than the Mirage – have already made similar runs.

Civilian cars and trucks packed with police cruised the streets. A leep was parked on a downtown street, mounted with an anti-aircraft gun. Two portly traffic cops in blue uniforms tried on green mesh-covered helmets, giggling at the sight of each other.

Police in green uniforms and black berets patrolled around the Foreign Ministry with Kalashnikovs slung over their shoulders. A pile of sandbags was erected on one of Baghdad's main shopping streets. Two policemen in camouflage stood atop the minaret of a downtown mosque.

People went about their business normally. Traffic was heavy, stores did bustling business and intercity buses arrived from and departed for remote Iraqi provinces.

Saddam met with the governors of Iraq's 18 provinces with a message for their citizens: "They have to dig trenches in their gardens," the official Iraqi News Agency reported.

"Tell every citizen to go with his family to the trenches during raids, so that even if a shell falls on their house, God forbid, a deep trench will protect them," INA quoted Saddam as telling the governors.

In the CBS interview, Saddam said his country did not lose the 1991 Persian Gulf War and would vigorously defend itself if attacked. CBS, which has released excerpts of the interview for the past two days, on Wednesday released the transcript of the three-hour interview.

"It is our duty, it is our responsibility to defend our country, to defend our children, to defend our people, and we are not going to succumb, neither to the United States nor to any other power," Saddam said.

The Iraqi leader said he still hoped war could be avoided "to spare the Americans from committing such a mistake and also to spare Iraq and the Iraqi people from being involved in such an experience."

Asked if he was afraid of being killed or captured, Saddam responded: "Whatever Allah decides."

"There is no value for any life without ... faith," he said. "The believers, while taking caution and care and trying to veer out and avoid any dangers and any traps ... the believer still believes that what God decides is acceptable."

Iraq's governors said they had completed preparations "to confront the invaders," the news agency said, forming "jihad groups of clerics and tribesmen to fight the invaders, and commando units to hunt helicopters."

There was no official comment on the Baghdad drill, but Iraqi news media reported Wednesday that Saddam, in a meeting with police commanders Tuesday night, asked the commander of west Baghdad traffic police whether his men had carried out a drill.

"Tomorrow a drill will be carried out," the commander, who wasn't identified, was quoted as saying.

"Good," Saddam reportedly responded.

Western Baghdad contains most government buildings and presidential palaces, while the east of the city is largely residential.

The police commander was quoted as saying his men had already carried out drills in the past, though there has never been any evidence of drills on the streets.

Columbia wing was a concern

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - One day before the Columbia disaster, senior NASA engineers worried the space shuttle's left wing might burn off and cause the deaths of the crew, describing a scenario remarkably like the one investigators believe ultimately happened. They never sent their warnings to NASA's brass.

The space agency released e-mails Wednesday also showing it was sufficiently concerned about possible damage to Columbia's insulating tiles that it asked the Defense Department – then abruptly changed its mind – to take pictures of the shuttle in orbit more than one week before its breakup.

The dozens of pages of e-mails described a far broader, internal debate about the seriousness of potential damage to Columbia from a liftoff collision with foam debris than previously acknowledged. They even considered instructing the crew to bail out.

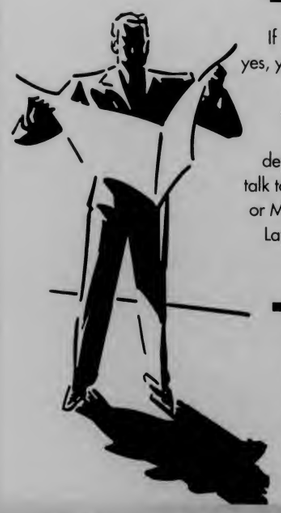
Engineers in Texas and Virginia fretted about the shuttle's safety during its final three days in orbit, with one wondering whether officials were "just relegated to crossing their fingers" and another questioning why such dire issues had been raised so late.

"Why are we talking about this on the day before landing and not the day after launch?" wrote William C. Anderson, an employee for the United Space Alliance LLC, a NASA contractor, less than 24 hours before the shuttle broke apart.

Concerns about Columbia prompted a request six days into the mission, on Jan. 22, for the U.S. Strategic Command to take satellite images of suspected damage to the shuttle's left wing. For weeks until Wednesday, NASA has denied it ever made such a request.

The space agency withdrew its informal request one day later amid fears it might have "cried wolf" and endangered future such requests, according to one e-mail.

Deciding against the satellite request, a NASA official wrote reassuringly to the Defense Department that Columbia was "in excellent shape" and that insulating foam that struck the shuttle on its mid-January liftoff was "not considered to be a major problem." Not everyone agreed.



Three days before the end of the doomed mission, one frustrated engineer, Robert Daugherty, asked, "Any more activity today on the tile damage or are people just relegated to crossing their fingers and hoping for the best?" The response: "I have not heard anything new."

After intense debate – occurring by phone and e-mails – the engineers, some supervisors and the head of the space agency's Langley research facility in Hampton, Va., decided against taking the matter to top NASA managers, including William F. Readdy, NASA's associate administrator for space flight.

"It was a surprise to us when the 'what-if' scenario played out," said Robert Doremus, head of the mechanical systems group in Mission Control, who met with reporters in Houston on Wednesday. "We were not expecting that."

The space agency has previously said mission controllers were unaware of these midlevel talks, but it was unclear how high these concerns were expressed. NASA has maintained that senior officials had confidence in an analysis by the Boeing Co., a contractor, that the shuttle would return safely.

Fire kills 10 at nursing home

By Kathryn Masterson
Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) – A suspicious fire ripped through a nursing home before daybreak yesterday, killing 10 people and forcing 100 residents – some of them bedridden, elderly and confused – into the freezing cold. Police said they wanted to question a resident about the blaze.

The fire at the Greenwood Health Center also injured 23 people, seven critically. Many of the injured were already chronically ill.

"It's certainly the worst fire we've had in the city of Hartford for several decades," Fire Chief Charles Teale said.

Investigators have detained a 23-year-old resident, Lt. Michael Manzi said. Police Chief Bruce Marquis later said the resident had not yet been questioned.

"We are unable to interview that individual right now because that person is under the care of medical professionals and thus deemed not stable," Marquis said.

He said the cause of the fire had not been determined.

Flames and thick smoke forced residents out of the single-story brick building and into the darkness. The home cares for coma patients, psychiatric patients and elderly or retarded people, and rescuers had to struggle to take many of them out on gurneys and in wheelchairs.

"Upon my arrival, it became apparent that all hands would be needed," Teale said.

Family members flooded the facility's parking lot, some clutching pictures and rosaries as they pleaded for information.

"Where is the fire? Where is the fire?" Maria Cunha sobbed, clutching her temples as she ran toward a police officer. She was looking for her mother, a 97-year-old resident of the home.

Jolie Marreo was looking for her 54-year-old uncle.

"He couldn't even have gotten out if he wanted to," she said, wiping away tears from behind her glasses. "He's blind."

The fate of the two residents was not immediately known.

Luis Henriquez held a silver-framed school photo of his 17-year-old son, who had been in a coma for three years.

"One of the ministers told me he didn't make it," he said. "I want to know if the body's still here."

The fire broke out at 2:40 a.m. and damaged two sections of the building. In all, 100 of the 148 patients were evacuated. Authorities later found a place for them in another part of the home, and three buses were brought to the scene to provide a warm shelter.

Temperatures were in the single digits at the time, but none of the patients was in the cold for more than 10 minutes, Teale said. State Rep. Minnie Gonzalez, who was at the scene, said one woman pleaded, "Please take me to my room. I'm cold."

More than 80 residents remained at the center Wednesday afternoon; about 30 were being transferred to other facilities, Mayor Eddie Perez said.

Fire Marshal William Abbott said the home was up to code, and extinguishers were present. There was no sprinkler system, but none was required. State officials said a Feb. 7 inspection found no fire or patient care violations.

The mayor said 12 nursing employees were on duty at the time of the fire.

Phyllis Kendall, a 64-year-old resident who is partially paralyzed because of spinal meningitis, called her daughter, Marcia McCrorey, after the fire.

"She said, 'I smelled smoke and I started screaming for somebody to come get me, come get me,'" McCrorey said. She said her mother heard fire doors closing and began to weep.

Debbie and Donald Duford showed up at the home and found her 53-year-old brother, Bill Carroll, a mentally retarded man with a lung ailment, by looking through a window of the facility.

"We expected the worst, but reminded ourselves that he was ambulatory," she said. "He said he wasn't scared."

Donna Smith found her father, Charles Harrison, the same way.

"Oh Lord!" she screamed, dropping to her knees to kiss the snow. "Thank you, Jesus! Thank you, Jesus! Thank you, Jesus!"

Band under investigation for fire

Paul Vanner, the sound engineer at The Station nightclub, answers reporters' questions yesterday.

both the club owners and the band members to invoke their Fifth Amendment right to refuse to testify.

"It's such a catastrophic loss of life. Realistically, with 97 deaths, no lawyer is going let a client talk to law enforcement," Roy said.

Paul Vanner, the stage manager and sound engineer at the club, said Wednesday that Great White's pyrotechnics lasted longer than he was used to seeing from other bands. While most last a second or so in flashing their sparkles across the stage, this display lasted far longer.

"I've never seen it that big and that long. It was about 20 seconds," Vanner said.

He said he expressed concerns about the safety of pyrotechnics to Michael Derderian about three months ago and the co-owner "seemed to take it to heart."

Vanner said he had seen about a dozen shows that used pyrotechnics – including about eight since he first noticed foam soundproofing at The Station 18 months ago. He said in each of those shows he was forewarned the special effects would be used. However, he said he was given no notice before the Great White show.

The soundproofing is part of the investigation. Authorities are trying to determine whether the club used an inexpensive and highly flammable brand that shouldn't have been installed.

Programming funds moved

The SGA successfully passed a motion to reallocate funds from the Programming Board to the Ways and Means Committee.

"What is wrong is the charter and that the fact that two people could decide where money should be spent. The Senate now has a responsibility to look into this. It's the Senate's job to fix it; the ball is in [its] court."

A motion was brought before the Senate by Chair of Finance Patrick Higgins and Thompson, stating that due to the Programming Board's inactive status, the funds should be placed into the long term reserves under the S-1 Budget Act.

"Three years ago the point of the Programming Board was to buy capital items for RSO's (Registered Student Organizations) so they wouldn't have to buy their own. Two years ago it was a sub-committee of the finance committee and allocated money to RSO's. Now for the past year it has been programming events," Thompson said.

"The Programming Board has no purpose and no mission statement, so we feel that until the charter is fixed, the money should be placed in the Long Term Reserves fund. It's not safe to leave $40,000 hanging around while we wait for a new charter," he said.

The Senate questioned the motion, with members asking if the Programming Board would get control of funding back if flaws within the charter and Board were fixed. Thompson said that the Senate and Ways of Means Committee would reevaluate the Board if it were proposed.

"The Secretary of Registry is not intending on allocating any more money this year," Thompson said. "It's obviously not in a safe place when two people can allocate up to $40,000, so by putting it into the long term reserves fund we can allocate it out to RSO's looking to get funded in the budget process."

The Senate passed the motion.

Senators also debated a motion calling for an SGA definition of the term diversity. Senator Matt Progen told the Senate that there is a need for a unified definition of the term.

"The motion is to include everyone's idea of the definition. Our personal opinions don't matter, it's our job to represent all students equally. I hope to see this as a guideline and reference for future legislation," Progen said. "We have to promote diversity, it's not exclusionary and this will remind us that diversity is not just race but it's all types."

The motion failed to pass.

The next SGA meeting is next Wednesday in Room 174 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. All meetings are open to the public.

Bulger's office may be eliminated promised to do more if left alone.

"I believe that what the Governor is proposing – were it ever to become law – would not be in the best interests of the students and the citizens of the Commonwealth," she said.

Romney's plan would replace Bulger's 68-member office with a new Executive Office of Education that would have broad oversight duties, according to the AP.

It would also single out UMass-Amherst for special treatment financially.

"It needs to have the latitude that we would never be able to give in a public higher education system that's weaving other interests in," Peter Nesson, Romney's top education advisor, told the AP. "There is a real desire to attract out-of-state, worldwide students to make it the world class institution that we want it to be."

Students in Amherst would take a hit under the proposed plan. Overall fees at UMass-Amherst would be increased between five and 15 percent for in-state residents, according to the AP, with the bill jumping from $5,586 to $6,424 per year. The Romney administration says that this would still be below the average tuition charged to other students in the state. A tuition increase has not been calculated yet.

At the Student Government Association (SGA) meeting last night, Speaker of the Senate Dan Saunders said that the SGA was not in a position to comment on the proposal yet. An emergency meeting of the Board of Trustees on March 12 was also announced at the SGA meeting.

to come in. We have gotten a lot of attention. UMass athletics has been helping us out. UVC-TV came in to do an interview with me today. flyers have been passed around."

MacGregor said that he saw over 100 students walk in to look around, and at least 50 had come in to play.

"Every time I walked through the Campus Center I saw the sign for the opening, so I wanted to come in," said Rami Harawi, a junior. "It's a nice place to come and rest between classes and it's a good price."

Although students were pleased with the new game room, many thought the managers should consider serving alcohol as another addition.

"I wouldn't have wanted them to do anything else with the space, but it would be nice if they made it a pub too," said Harawi.

Union Billiards has no admission price. Eight of the pool tables are rented by the hour and one table is coin-operated, allowing users to pay per game. The cost for the hourly rentals is five dollars.

Union Billiards' regular hours are Sundays from 3 p.m. to 11 p.m., Monday through Wednesday from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., Thursday and Friday from 11 a.m. to midnight and Saturdays from 3 p.m. to midnight.

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2003

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Governor's proposal remains uncertain for UMass system

Governor Mitt Romney unveiled his proposed fiscal budget for 2004 yesterday, a plan that would dismantle the University of Massachusetts system and relieve William M. Bulger of his post as university President.

Planned to save the state some $200 million, the proposal would also move to spin off the flagship Amherst campus and the UMass Medical School in Worcester, as well as merge six other campuses in both central and western Massachusetts: Berkshire Community College in Pittsfield and the Massachusetts College of Liberal Arts in North Adams; Greenfield and Holyoke community colleges; and Mount Wachusett Community College in Gardner and Fitchburg State College.

Amherst would remain public, though it would operate independently from Lowell, Dartmouth and Boston, all of which would operate in a regional system in conjunction with the community colleges and local businesses.

As for Bulger, the plan would replace his position and his 68-member cabinet with a newly formed Executive Office of Education.

Perhaps the strongest point to be drawn from Wednesday's announcement, however, is overwhelming uncertainty. Timeframes are far from absolute; plans past the initial stages are obscure at best; potential ramifications, of course, impossible to foresee.

On Tuesday, UMass spokesman Robert Connolly said, "President Bulger knows better than anyone that a governor's budget proposals are just that – proposals."

However, they are proposals that hit the public sphere with heavy implications. Though designed to reestablish a financial rhythm in Massachusetts, the plan would radically alter the education system throughout the state.

At this point, it is far too early to know whether the proposal would improve education in Massachusetts, or if it is only being drawn up to save the state some money.

Nonetheless, the loss of Bulger and the reorganization of the state system would hardly hurt the campus as much as continued massive budget cuts have. Bulger has done some good things to improve the reputation of UMass-Amherst, but he makes $309,000 a year and also operates a 68-member office. All this, and he appears on campus about as often as Danny Glover.

If continued budget cuts really force Massachusetts to make radical changes to the educational system, then Bulger and his staff should be expendable.

And all signs unfortunately point to hard times ahead. With a Republican governor in office, it is unlikely he will raise taxes over the next few years to improve the state's schools. Already, seven athletic teams and countless other programs have been cut, and every department has lost an array of teachers to early retirement.

In this kind of atmosphere, the quality of education can only go downhill, so getting rid of Bulger and reorganizing the entire system may be the best way to salvage what UMass-Amherst still has.

However, looking that far ahead is virtually impossible, and right now uncertainty is the only certainty surrounding Romney's proposal.

Roads you didn't travel

Imagine this. It is a typical Thursday morning for you. You wake up and follow your usual routine of getting ready for your first class, except this particular morning you're unusually hungry and decide to have a quick breakfast. You think nothing of it at first, but as the day wears on you realize that a domino effect has taken place and you find yourself in the middle of a highly irregular chain of events. Maybe as a result of having breakfast, you are late to your Chemistry lecture, and instead of taking your usual seat near the front, you are forced to sit in the back where you find yourself next to an extremely attractive individual of the opposite sex. You spend the class chatting away and even exchange numbers, but you miss all the material that day and end up failing your next quiz. Now, had you skipped that bowl of cereal you may have passed the quiz, but you also would be lacking the phone number of someone you find to be very interesting. That's when you start thinking, "What if I had done things differently?"

Paige Cram

I have often found myself in the middle of moments like this one, moments where I can't help but ask myself, "What if I hadn't had that bowl of cereal?" Would I be in a different place? Would I be a different person? Is there some parallel universe out there where I skipped breakfast and things are completely different? Or would I have ultimately ended up in the same place either way?

That's a scary thought if you think about it, that even the smallest decision can have such an impact. And if all that can result from a decision about a single meal, then what about the major ones we've made? The effects would be staggering.

There are plenty of times in our lives when we come to a fork in the road and the correct way is unclear. Sometimes there are several choices we can make that will lead to an acceptable outcome, and I often wonder about how my life would be altered if I had done things a little differently. That's not to say I have regrets. In fact, I have very few, and I'm fairly certain that all my choices were for the best. So why question?

I'm sure we all do the same thing. We ourselves before we make decisions and sometimes we continue to doubt long after the decision has been made. I think it is because, especially at this age, we all have insecurities about the future. It's impossible to know where we will be in ten, five, even two years. But yet, we try to plan, and are expected to plan what we want the rest of our lives to be like. Well, I can honestly say that at this point I have no idea. Maybe there is a parallel version of myself who made different decisions, and maybe she has a little more direction and is a little less lost. But isn't it more important that we enjoy life and are truly happy than knowing exactly where we will end up?

> "Maybe there is a parallel version of myself who made different decisions, and maybe she has a little more direction and is a little less lost."

Sure, uncertainty can be scary, constantly wondering if you could be messing up your life one small decision at a time. But the way I see it, there is no such thing as messing up your life. It is your life, your own personal universe that you are building one decision at a time. And it shouldn't have to live up to anyone's expectations but your own. The choices you make, good or bad, the lessons you learn and the experiences you have are all yours and yours alone. So how can you go wrong?

The point is that none of us can be certain of our future. That's half the fun. We are creating our own futures right now with every passing moment. So why waste time "what if-ing" ourselves to death when we know we'll never get the answers? For better or worse, we are where we are because of who we are and what we have done, and there's no changing that. So we have to learn to give ourselves some credit, to trust that we are making good decisions even if we don't know the outcome just yet. And if you're like me, and you believe that there is such a thing out there as fate, then you can take comfort in the fact that even if it's unclear now, everything happens for a reason and in the end, it will all work out for the best.

Living the legacy

Mark Ostroff

I remember watching President Bush's "virtual tour" of the Oval Office on the official website of the White House and seeing the collection of busts depicting some of history's most admired presidents all around his office. And, of course, among the heads was who many consider to be our greatest president: Abraham Lincoln.

I'm not a historian, but I do believe that anyone who wants to be an appreciator of the American political experience has to take Lincoln's work in high esteem. People have to consider his pressure at healing a divided nation, while doing what he felt was a step forward for the values and vision of America.

From his writings and speeches, he came across as a minister to his congregation. It wasn't God he preached about, but his own faith in America's democracy and the values that we must have in order to uphold it. Whether or not it was an extension of his piety and Christian school of thought, he still saw something special in America.

He would have been the first to tell you that his country was far from perfect. Like any other good president, Lincoln had worries and fears for his nation. We know that Lincoln feared chaos and reactionary thought. We certainly know that he feared a collapsed union. Most of all, he feared ignorance and blind devotion, for those are all you really need to undermine freedom and democracy.

Ignorance and blind devotion don't have to come in the form of a swastika or a burning cross. It's a different world with different ideas today. It can come in the form of comforting rhetoric, patriotic peer pressure or even "Joe Millionaire." They say, "What you don't know, can't hurt you." In the end, Honest Abe will prove them wrong.

America is, once again, at a crossroads in the history books, and it looks like the people are far from prepared for it. Everyday, the masses are becoming blind to what is happening around them, but are still empowered with making decisions that will impact America's future. Americans have been misinformed, and misinformation is about as bad a social disease as homelessness or AIDS.

It is an undisputed fact that a nation without an informed citizenry is only a democracy by name, not by practice. Whatever the reasoning is behind this lack of information doesn't matter when the masses are left completely helpless from those who have the power to replace hard truth with pre-digested passion.

> "Passion, panic and laziness will do more to undermine this country than any terrorist or dictator can ever dream of."

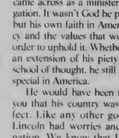
America has taken the first bold steps backward by allowing bills through congress without even reading them. (Hey, if it has the word "Patriot" in it, then it must be good, right?) Leaders have explicitly advised their citizens to ask no questions and to do as they're told.

While Americans actively demonstrate over a bad episode of "Joe Millionaire," they pay no heed to the "Patriot Act 2," which was uncovered in the past days. We sit at our television and listen to patriotic flattery, aimed at those who go about their lives and do nothing as history passes them by. Passion, panic and laziness will do more to undermine this country than any terrorist or dictator can ever dream of.

Next week, March 5 to be exact, students are going to walk out of classes in order to demonstrate what they believe is right. Although it has a lot to do with the Iraq issue, I encourage anybody else with questions about issues in this country to go.

I will not endorse any form of disrespect to your professors, but I challenge any student that reads this column to do something for their country on this day: I challenge them to help keep democracy alive and ask questions. No debates. No mockery. Just questions. You will gain knowledge, perspective and a little civic achievement. You have nothing to lose but embarrassing naivete.

If you support the war, then I dare you to challenge your beliefs and speak to someone with opposite feelings about it. If you are against the war, I dare you to question those who support it. There will be plenty of teach-ins, demonstrations, activists and professors who would be glad to tell you the reasoning behind their points of views.



We all have plenty to learn from other people and this is the only way America will ever fit the proud visions of our greatest leaders.

Flags, bumper stickers and tear-jerking speeches have never done anything for this country. They will never show a slave his freedom. They will never let a black man sit in a white classroom. And they will never stand up to those who want to control our lives and thoughts. Only the people can do this.

And when the people give in, America gives in. If America can't preserve true Democracy, who can?

Terrorism of the First Amendment

Jamie Loo

Toni Smith is senior sociology major from New York City, but she is no ordinary student. She is the 5'10" forward and captain of the Manhattanville College women's basketball team. Smith is outspoken against the war, and has made it a point for everyone to know.

Since the start of the season, Smith has refused to face the flag during the Star-Spangled Banner at the start of games. Without fail, at each game both at home and away, she has turned 90 degrees away from the flag and has cast her eyes to the ground. Her protest isn't just against the war but against "inequalities" that exist in the American system. She also feels that the government's priorities are not on improving the "quality of life for all of its people, but rather on expanding its own power."

> "Smith was also greeted with chants of 'U.S.A.' and 'Leave our country.'"

This past Saturday, during their last home game of the season, Jerry Kiley, a Vietnam war veteran, ran onto the court and held an American flag in front of Smith, while she was lining up for another player to shoot a free throw.

"She disgraced herself and she disgraced flag," said Kiley.

I believe Kiley was the one who disgraced himself.

Kiley isn't the only one who has openly opposed Smith's protest. At a recent game the Mount St. Mary student government bought more than $100 worth of small flags, and distributed them before the game. More than 500 students waved the flags and jeered at Smith at every opportunity they could get. At the close of the game, fans sung "God Bless America."

I think the student government association at Mount St. Mary is a bunch of hypocrites.

During their Feb. 11 game at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy (USMMA), the stands were packed with over 300 people, which was a record turnout. Fans were once again toting flags, and at halftime, 50 flag carrying students stood across from the Manhattanville bench until the game was over. Smith was also greeted with chants of "U.S.A." and "Leave our country." USMMA sports information director Kim McNulty said, "We were proud of the professionalism with which the midshipmen displayed their feelings. They did nothing to offend or make the game an unsafe atmosphere. They were expressing their opinion."

Proud? They should be ashamed of themselves.

The First Amendment guarantees us the right to free speech and free expression. Smith's protest is protected by the Constitution and she has the right to turn away from the flag if she wishes. Kiley and the students at those games also have the right to disagree with her. However, I don't believe this manner of protest was the way to go about it. I think that the waving of these flags in order to purposefully upset Smith is completely disrespectful.

It's a terrorism of her right to free speech. When you terrorize someone or something you are striking fear in them in some way. I bet Smith could care less at this point; after all that she's been through I doubt that she's fearful. However, that still doesn't make these actions right.

It's not like Smith was taking out a lighter and burning the stars and stripes before each game. She's simply turning away from the flag. Kiley can disagree all he wants, but he has no right to disrespect her right to her opinion by shoving a flag in her face. Smith was doing a peaceful act, while Kiley's act was one to strike terror and make her feel bad about her opinion.

And no one should have to feel bad about his/her opinion.

Kiley, the USMMA and the Mount St. Mary student government are hypocrites for claiming their first amendment right is more important than Smith's. Agree or disagree with the government, the first amendment protects us all. Smith isn't being un-American by dissenting. She has the right to express her opinion in peace, and not be harassed by people with flags in her face. Those same people have the right to peaceably support the war and not have someone like Smith burning a flag on their lawns. It's not a matter of who is wrong or right, but a matter of respecting the other side's opinion.

And when you really look at the Constitution as a whole, it's the same document that grants our government the power to go to war. We have the power to go to war, and we have the choice to support the government or to dissent. The flag is simply a symbol. Everybody involved in this is fighting for the same thing really; upholding the ideals of the Constitution.

In a statement about her protest Smith wrote, "It is my right as an American to stand for my beliefs the way others have done against me... patriotism can be shown in many ways, but those who choose to do so by saluting the flag should recognize that the American flag stands for individuality and freedom. Therefore, any true patriot must acknowledge and respect my right to be different."

Rational discourse has nothing on Bush

On Monday, Saddam Hussein challenged President Bush to a televised debate on the issues concerning Bush's proposed war. Saddam envisioned an exchange of ideas and arguments similar to the form used for the presidential debate. The Bush administration swiftly renounced the idea, with spokesman Ari Fleischer stating that, "This is not a serious issue...there is no debating his need to disarm." In one narrow-minded sentence, the United States has not only disseminated its pedagogical stance on what Iraq does or does not need to do, but also blithely rejected a most rational potential solution to the conflict between American and Iraqi interests. When one leader advocates a peaceful exchange of ideas and the other dismisses it and prepares a massive military invasion, it is not difficult to realize which of the two is the real fascist.

Jason Clemence

Two weeks ago, groups of peaceful and well-organized people assembled in large cities around the world to protest the war, demonstrating that a significant percentage of the human race, Americans included, does not approve of Bush's aggression toward a country that has not shown aggression toward us. The protests were given scant coverage by the mainstream (and thus conservative) media outlets.

Bush's acknowledgment of these demonstrations: "Size of protest, it's like deciding, well, I'm going to decide policy based upon a focus group." Apparently it is no longer the duty of the American president to take the opinions of his citizens into account.

A few weeks before the protests, Laura Bush cancelled a poetry event at the White House after learning that many of the poets planned to read anti-war material. Her excuse was that she wanted the event to be about poetry rather than politics, as though one can possibly separate works of poetry, art and music from the ideologies that inspire them. Following the First Lady's example, the producers of the Grammys specifically prohibited artists from discussing the war on the air.

I cite these various examples to show that the impending, seemingly inevitable war with Iraq has become such a single-mindedly pursued goal of the Bush administration that it has blocked, censored and disregarded any form of rational discourse that might indicate just how wrong it is. John Ashcroft's exercise in McCarthyism, the Patriot Act, has made the publication of radical thought the equivalent of high treason. But organized debate, public demonstration and poetry are not extreme; they are legitimate forms of protest, and are absolutely necessary to provide a sane viewpoint in the midst of widespread warmongering.

Our immediate community, composed mostly of liberal and educated people, seems to be ardently opposed to the war, but there are millions of Americans who accept the coming war simply because Bush says they should. There are American soldiers who will needlessly lose their lives in the deserts of Iraq, but they go anyhow because it's their job and their bosses tell them it's time to go. As President Bush and his cabinet continue to suppress the expression of peace and the discussion of alternatives to war, more and more people will simply sit back and accept it.

Instead of watching a televised debate between the leader of the free world and the leader of the country he wishes to conquer, which would be an enlightening milestone in global politics, the masses will continue to be pacified by numbing programs involving Michael Jackson's justification for his latest deviancy, fake millionaires and would-be singers who are too concerned with becoming part of the capitalist media machine to think about the atrocities that the U.S. is committing in the Middle East. These frivolous televised distractions are not coincidental.

> "History has not been kind to leaders who go to war amongst massive dissent."

History has not been kind to leaders who go to war amongst massive dissent. Opposition to the war on Iraq is nearing the intensity that was prevalent at the height of Vietnam, and the war hasn't even begun yet. A few years from now, Saddam's regime may be toppled. We may have our own oppressive government installed in Iraq, allowing us unlimited access to its various desirable resources. America may be basking in peace and economic stimulation, lauding George Bush for his eager willingness to go to war.

But in the long run, problems will arise. Which major American city will be the first to be struck by vengeful guerilla warfare? Will we maintain our hold on Iraq amidst the millions of people in that region who will despise us and regard us as evil despots? Will our allies, who have so strongly discouraged Bush from his warhorse in the first place, have any sympathy for us?

It's not too late to expose this war as the imperialist sham that it is, but with the Bush administration doing everything it can to suppress dissenting speech, it may be difficult.

GOV'T MULE

"I don't really care ... you know there are so many other things to worry about than what you get labeled as."

Rob Derhak is moving on.

Long past being labeled a member of a jam band, Derhak and moe. just want to keep playing music.

"I just look at it as, no matter what you call it, I'm still going to be doing what I want to do and do the same thing: it doesn't matter to me." The jam band label is frequently denounced in online chats and tape trade discussions to the point where fans are offended by the labeling of their favorite musicians.

"It's like anything else. You know people say 'oh this is jazz.' Well how does Herbie Hancock sound anything like ... I don't know ... Kenny Werner or Herb Alpert and the Tijuana brass; it still falls into the realm of jazz. That's just how it goes."

For 13 years now, moe. has been a part of the aptly labeled jam band scene. The five-member band – rising from Buffalo, N.Y., and now resounding throughout the entire northeast – has seen many configurations, including an early saxophonist and several trials with percussionists.

The three mainstays – Derhak and guitarists Al Schnier and Chuck Garvey – are now joined by Vinnie Amico on drums and a returned Jim Laughlin on percussion. As if this dynamic wasn't enough for the band, Al also plays mandolin, keyboards and the moog, and Jim plays washboard, acoustic guitar and flute.

In their 10 plus years, they have rapidly climbed the ladder of success – a quick trip to Japan selling out the Fillmore in their first west coast appearance, hosting their own music fest (the mis.do.wont and putting out seven studio albums. Through it all they have kept an unassuming perspective.

"Well, I don't like to count on anything. I just like to kind of count on what we're doing now. I always think at the very least we'll be at least where we are now," Derhak said.

"We're always trying to do more stuff. We're going to get a DVD out there, we just put out our new website and we're always just sort of looking toward the future to a certain degree." Derhak said the band has some goals to boost their tours, including larger venues and another paddle-jump.

"We want to hit Europe. I And I would be psyched to be playing nice theaters across the country kind of standard. In the Northeast, that's what we do, but were still doing bars and stuff where we're lesser known. It would be nice to kind of just get up to that level where we can put on a full light show and full show everywhere."

Locally, moe. has filled the Calvin Theater in Northampton, and drew a crowd for an impromptu mid-week acoustic show at the Fine Arts Center in 2000. Arkansas, where Derhak was calling from, is one of those areas where the band is lesser known and where it would result to trying to fill a bar.

"I'm in the state of Arkansas on a Monday and Tuesday night," he said. "It's like, where are you going to play?"

Still, he is happy with the progress the band has made. "We are definitely outgrowing smaller venues," he said. The live show is where moe. has had its greatest success. As unpredictable as the band's own performances can be, moe. is frequently joined on stage by both rising and established musicians, including Peter Frampton, John Popper and Phish's Mike Gordon.

"Sometimes it's like, 'Wow is this really me?' That's all you can do: ask, 'Is this my life?'"

But the nature of the music and the easy-going attitude of the band lends itself to these guests.

"If the people are cool, then the set ends up being a lot of fun to play, and if they listen to what you're doing and play off of that, it's cool," he said. "When Popper came on, it was like he was in our band."

Earlier this year, the Jammy award show – the jam band equivalent to the Grammy awards – was held in New York City. At the show, moe. was joined on stage by Blue Oyster Cult, a band it frequently covers during its live shows.

"They were really, really cool and great, we had great fun," he said. Asked whether Blue Oyster Cult knew how often moe. covered them, Derhak said "they probably didn't until someone got in touch with them; yeah, you know I don't know actually. That was one thing I didn't think of asking." The two bands joined to play "Don't Fear the Reaper."

moe. received a Jammy for its performance at the Bonnaroo music festival this past summer in Tennessee.

It was just like any other show to me. We played the late night tent, so we didn't play in front of the 170,000 ... in the tent all the walls were open, so basically there were probably about 20,000 people along the side of the tent," Derhak said.

"It was very chill," he continued. "It was amazing how few problems there were, like overdoses and whatever. Overall there were very, very few."

In addition to the growing number of guests, moe. has continued with its trend of covering songs. "A lot of our shows have been sold out, and the ones that haven't been have been nice. We've been adding like a new weirder, just different cover each night, mixing up the set list a lot, a lot of stuff from 'Wormwood'," he said of the bands seventh and latest studio release.

Keeping the live shows interesting and factoring in more than 13 years of music is a process of selecting the crowd favorites and hoping that the new stuff works out well.

"I don't really so much think of it in terms of old and new; there is just kind of an A list of material and a B list, and you know what people really dig, and then there are like new songs that you think have a lot of potential, so you try to sandwich them in good places."

And he does so with great success – and not alone as Schnier, Garvey,

Nearly three years gone from the passing of his friend and bassist, Warren Haynes still keeps an ear bent toward the banks of the deep evil, listening for the rhythm that drove blood through the heart of his band, Gov't Mule.

"Allen Woody was, in some ways, greater than the world even knew," he says.

It's early February, and Haynes is speaking from his home in New York, the quiet behind him an unusual, empty palette over which his voice is still a dominant chord.

It's a world away from the August 26 morning in 2000, a dawn that rose just over a week after Mule wrapped another leg on a never-ending tour, when Woody was found dead in his hotel suite at the Courtyard Marriott Hotel in Queens. With drummer Matt Abts at his side, Haynes began grieving by way of questioning – considering his own life and the livelihood that had, for so long, made it worthwhile.

"It was hard to even consider going on without Woody," he says. "Gov't Mule was based on the chemistry the three of us had, and when you take a third of that away, it's really scary. After talking to people who had been through similar losses and managed to carry on, we realized we weren't the only people who had ever felt that kind of pain. The important thing was to keep the music – once we started looking at it from a different perspective, it started making more sense."

FROM THE DEEP END...

The phrase gathered itself in the weighty atmosphere of New York's The Theater 99, collected In pieces by Phish bassist Mike Gordon and made to fit as bassist after bassist plugged into Woody's old, cranky SVT cabinet. Gordon found what he had before him was equal parts Woody and the essence of those who had come to pay their respects. Something that spoke both of life's frailty and the last few notes on the bass – the once that make the building groan before dropping off into a heavy silence.

The Banks of the Deep End.

"I think that phrase really hit home," says Haynes. "When I first heard it, I thought, 'Yeah, that's very bittersweet, but it sums up what this whole thing is about.'"

This "whole thing," of course, was the unimaginable recruitment of 24 bass players, the result of a casual aside Haynes tossed out amongst friends. To replace Woody, of course, you'd need Jack Bruce. You'd have to get John Entwistle. And then you'd need Phil Lesh and Billy Cox and Bootsy Collins.

So Haynes went out and gathered them all.

A few calls yielded some two dozen more, and the guitarist, along with Abts, found himself in the recording frenzy of a lifetime. Multiple sessions result-

The Yohimbe Brothers

By MATTHEW DESPRES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

NORTHAMPTON – To spend time with the Yohimbe Brothers – DJ Logic and guitarist Vernon Reid – is to sit under a conversational pendulum and listen for the movement as opposites attract.

Logic catches you on the sly, whispering truths that Reid's wide, new moon eyes respond to. The dreadlocked guitarist, his chin wrapped from the bottom in a glaring spot of blue facial hair, glances over from the small, backstage bar in the corner of the Pearl Street nightclub, jumpstarted midthought while mixing a spoonful of honey into his tea.

"Wait, wait, now who said that?" he says.

"Yeah," says Logic quietly. "Read that again."

The Brothers pick up on a statement calling out the turntable as a passe trend: the tired notion that spinning vinyl is on the way out like guitars have been every few years for the last five decades. Their voices react in harmony – Logic the rhythm, Reid the solo – and sound as natural together as a guitar strung on top of the one and two.

"You know, it's funny, because for some people guitars and turntables are like natural enemies," says Reid, settling down. "For them, on some level, it's like the turntable is coming to supplant the guitar, and that's why certain people feel threatened and feel weird. I think the turntable is absolutely valid; it's a combination of percussion and all sorts of things, for making melodies..."

He stirs methodically while Logic follows.

"A lot of people are looking at it as a tool, putting it in a lot of different forms," he says. "You know, look at the washboard – that wasn't intended to be an instrument, but somebody picked it up and started rubbing a spoon against it, and that right there is like an acoustic scratch – a rhythm. The next thing you know, the turntable came, and that was a mistake, and that was the electric scratch right there. The blues man was rapping and the washboard man was scratching."

THE BLUES MAN FROM BROOKLYN AND THE WASHBOARD MAN FROM THE BRONX.

Experiments in sound, Reid and Logic have centered a lifestyle around the idea; the former a major musical catalyst in the seminal rock band Living Colour, the latter a member of the early-90s alternative outfit Eve and I and a tireless contributor to music of all shapes. Both had a significant hand in the formation of the Black Rock Coalition, a collective front for the expression and support of black artists. With roots nearly 10 years deep, the 2002 collaboration between the two that yielded "Front End Lifter" was the statement of a decade's relationship; the first official Word from the Brothers Yohimbe.

"Pretty much, we were both doing our thing," says Logic, "and our schedules came together at the right time, and we were all able to do it."

"It," as it turns out, was the construction of a common ground for the free creation of sound – a boundless environment that allowed instruments to become one another. "Front End Lifter" took punk, funk, freedom and jazz to be natural companions. And then the Brothers brought it on the road.

The successful 2002 tour is enjoying a one-week reprise that begins this night in Northampton, and already it's a study in live rock tradition: a long sound check, last minute soundboard adjustments, an early patron or two making their way to the quiet bar.

"Who's this playing tonight?" asks one.

moe. for the music

Chuck Garvey of moe. has shared his talent with both DJ Logic and Gov't Mule.

Amico and I ought to all contribute to the process.

"It's sort of like I imagine what TV execs do when trying to do a fall schedule or something – you know, like when they're putting together the Thursday night prime time lineup versus the Sunday night. I guess if you think of it in terms like that, it seems to make sense," Derbak said.

And every live show is different. "My wife will put on moe sometimes and it will be a live thing in the middle of a jam and I won't even know that it's us cause it's just in sync like it's some fog that we hit somewhere that's never to be recreated again, and I just kind of let in that it was us," Derbak said.

"Wormwood" features much from these live shows. moe. took a daring step with this album. Taking live recordings from concert tapes and adding to them in the studio, moe. put together an album that flows uninterrupted, from start to finish, and features songs that have been tried out on stage for several years. Some of the songs can be found on the "Warts and All" live show releases.

The album was mastered at the Long View Farm in North Brookfield, Mass. We did recording there for "No Dov" and we've tried to go back there it's nice," he said. "It's cool, you know, they totally take care of you and they have horses and stuff. It's a farm that they've converted into a studio, so it's nice to just get away from everything and be able to do that."

To find Derbak's inspiration you have to look beyond the music he plays. "To be honest, I don't really listen to jam bands all that much. I have my private collection," he said. "Any type of music, a wide array of stuff, you know, like I like to listen to The Flaming Lips and H. McHale and Little Feat or something and Gershwin. You know, it's just what I like."

Playing with the bands he plays with and with the number of musicians Derbak listens to, he has a pretty firm idea of who to look for in rising talent.

"Umphrey's McGee — real good band. I just know those guys and I've met them," he said. "When you listen to their live tapes they sound, you can hear it."

Umphrey's, said Derbak, has its strength in the live show. "There are a lot of bands out there that a lot of people like — and I can't name anybody, but it's just like you hear their tapes and you say, 'Well you can see these guys being popular for a few years and that's about it.' You listen to Umphrey's live stuff, and they sound a lot big[ger] than when they're at now."

Warren Haynes speaks from the 'Deep End' ed in "The Deep End" albums, two volumes of new Mule born from the respect Woody had quietly collected from his peers. In the wake of tragedy, the new songs put the spotlight directly on Abts and Haynes, forcing them to react at the absolute peak of their creative instincts.

"Matt is one of the best [drummers] I've ever had the opportunity to work with," says Haynes. "He did an amazing job of locking in with each bass player — the rhythm sections throughout the record sound as though they've been playing together for a long time, and that's really the foundation."

Abts has since said it "either scares the hell out of you, or you embrace it." Haynes embraced fully.

"Yeah, absolutely," he says. "To look over everyday and see a different legend where our best friend Al use to stand was intimidating but beautiful. Everyone was there for the right reason, and that was the fact that we had lost a truly great musician in his own right. [We] were there to celebrate that fact."

Gordon captured the celebration on film for his "Rising Low" documentary, released last year to both fan and critical praise. A study of his instrument's finer nuances – and the subtleties of the musicians drawn toward it – Haynes says Gordon's own instincts helped to inform the work at hand.

"Mike did an excellent job, and one of the reasons for that is he's still a bass player," he says. "All these other bass players knew him or knew of him, so they were able to relax, put their guard down and be themselves. I think that enabled us to capture some stuff we might not have otherwise."

...BACK TO SHORE

These days, Haynes finds himself once again celebrating his life moment to moment. Through it all, he's sustained his reputation as the hardest working man in music, sharing stages with The Dead, The Derek Trucks Band, Trey Anastasio and, most recently, Gregg Allman at the Radio City Music Hall's "Tribute to the Blues." His own generosity is reciprocated time and again, feeding the circle and keeping the music alive.

"I think musicians, or maybe human beings in general, tend to underestimate their own value and the impact they've had on the community," he says. "I think you find that a lot of the people [in this scene] are really in it for the music. They tend to be a little more humble and down to earth for some reason. I don't even know if I can explain it."

For now, Haynes can afford to forgo explanation in favor of more music. Mule is set to stage a "Deepest End" show on May 3 in New Orleans, at which they'll formally announce a permanent bass player and draw the final curtain on the last two years. There's talk of a mini-festival tour this summer, something "along the lines of Summer Session, hopefully like four or more compatible bands to go and do some outdoor stuff and have some fun," he says. There is also a solo appearance scheduled at this year's Bonnaroo festival in Tennessee.

And of course, in the space between, more music to be written.

"I always kind of need the solace of being alone," he says. "I tend to write when there's nobody else around – usually three, four, five o'clock in the morning. I always go through that transitional period, where I haven't written anything in a long time, and I'm scared and wondering if I'm ever going to write another song. [Laughs.] Then eventually, two or three things start happening at once, the ideas start pouring out, and I know I'm back on the track again."

Vernon Reid spins new Logic into his art

Vernon Reid, left, and DJ Logic - The Yohimbe Brothers - brought the sounds of "Front End Lifter" to the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton on Feb. 21.

"The Yohimbe Brothers: DJ Logic, Vernon Reid...."

The initial unfamiliarity is devastated later during the opening strains of "Ponk." "FELs" funk-punk exercise as the patron in question has his free extremities pulled to life by the sound of music being created on the fly. It's that deconstruction of space this scene embraces – between instruments, between people – and similarly long line that The Yohimbe Brothers are striving to draw in between.

"The separation between [musician and audience] is artificial, and many artists like that separation," says Reid. "At one time, musicians were really considered to be like magicians. They exposed you to something. Somewhere along the line it became this thing where we know so much about everything, and that's used to put a musician in a box. And then musicians put the audience in a box, and we wind up in these boxes. That shit is so foul; it's like role-playing, but role-playing that you don't choose."

Logic agrees. "I love to go out and watch a show from the audience view and from that perspective," he says. "Talking to people out there and seeing what they feel about it. There's a lot of cats that don't really do that, but for me, I have no problem just shaking somebody's hand or listening to somebody's CD."

INVITATION TO A SITUATION

Logic has processed more than his share of other people's music in recent months. Off-days spent scouring basement vinyl bins, set breaks tucked away in the audience and hours on-stage as the great integrator – spinning as a new texture on top of familiar sounds. Earlier this month, he wrapped a three-night solo stand in the Midwest and a one-off with Soulive. His biggest coup was in Tennessee, coupled with Rob Wasserman at the Woody Guthrie Tribute — an event sized up and stripped down by the likes of son Arlo, Corey Harris and Rob Watson. It's this chance for education, according to Logic, that drives him as an artist.

"All the solo shows were great, and I've just been trying to do something a little different, just practicing up on my solo set," he says. "The Woody Guthrie thing was great – getting my education on, my history, all of that. I mean, Woody, y'know? [Laughs]."

Logic has also parlayed his own lessons into opportunities for others. His club dates and festival appearances not only grant wide exposure to his brand of music, but also penetrate discussion on the art as a whole, a craft met with both praise and heavy-handed criticism. He's bonded with the likes of Stephen Webber, a professor at the Berkelee School of Music in Boston, whose workshop approach to turntablism has helped generate interest on a grassroots level. Logic, the kid from the old school, who spun his way not through classrooms but through New York City clubs, sees only the positive in it.

"Big ups to [him], you know?" he says. "When I did a class at Berkelee, just to see the amount of people that came out to see me do my thing was special, because it was musicians – not that many DJ's, but people seeing how they could incorporate [turntablism]. I see it being a wonderful thing to happen."

WELCOME TO THE FREQ SHOW

The show was to have started three minutes ago, Reid, however, is far from done. His discussion has bounced from ecological disaster wrought by rabbits in Australia to Buddy Guy and Alvin Lee, up to Eminem and more broadly to the world climate and impending war. Somehow, his passion hinges equally on all of these.

"I came into this as a fan. I'm a fan of music," he says. "For me, I want to be the kind of guitarist that me as a fan would like to hear. It's not about the scales; it's not about the technique; it's about what's in the heart. Sometimes that can be hard to get to. But if you can get to it, man, then you can give something to people."

One hour later. The band is blazing "fenemental" five – drums, keys, scratches and beautifully broken vocals skipped off the center-stage chaos pad. Reid steps forward and shrugs his body tightly around the guitar. Across the stage, Logic supplies the bottom line under a shy grin.

The solo and the rhythm – the music – play on.

"Warren [Haynes] is a for real cat," says Vernon Reid. A simple mention of the name sparks the guitarist to life. "When you see him do his thing, he really is that guy doing that. Not some other guy pretending to be that guy. I had the honor of sitting in with him on New Year's Eve, and it was just real. The sound check was just as real as the gig. The gig was just some shit happening in front of some people. It's great to see."

The generous nod from one musician to the next, shared as naturally as a guitar lick passed around stage. It's a defining quality of the so-called "jam band" scene – the gig jumping, the guest appearances and the competitive drive born of an interest to simply make each other better.

It's brotherhood. It's Reid sharing a stage with Mule on New Year's Eve. It's Haynes' "Sco-Mule" as retold by DJ Logic. It's Logic spinning out the beginning lines of "Captain America" with moe. on 2001's "Dither." It's Reid and Logic as The Yohimbe Brothers, grinning ear to ear at the moment of a Haynes name drop.

It's the circle. It's moe.'s Chuck Garvey, onstage in Boston, trading his Mule shirt for a Pabst Blue Ribbon top. Musicians as fans first.

"I would keep your eyes open," chuckles moe. bassist Rob Derbak. "Those guys [in Mule] are good friends of ours. We like to help each other out."

Anything, of course, for the music.

Rest those calorie conscious woes and await some fat-burning facts

There's no denying that the United States has one of the largest obesity epidemics in the world. Since 1991, the percentage of obese individuals (persons with a body mass index of 30 or higher) has increased by over 60 percent. In response to the overwhelming and sometimes all-consuming desire to shed these extra pounds, miracle pills and diets are being shoved down our throats quicker than a box of Twinkies. Listed below are some of the most popular fads on the market today.

The Atkins diet began as a study by Dr. Richard Atkins in the 60's and culminated in his first book, "Dr. Atkins' Diet Revolution," published in 1972. I'm sure we all know where this program went from here; cutting carbohydrates causes the body to burn the existing fat reserves, and voila, you're thin. Problem. Failing to up your water intake and eating hamburger meat sans bun while watching "American Idol" will catch up with you in the long run. And in a society that demands instant gratification, it's easy to take a spin on the magic diet roller coaster of hell. Recent studies are examining the possibility that this method of weight loss could actually contain grains of truth. But improper use of this technique can cause dehydration and muscle deterioration because of the body's desperate search for fuel.
